With the bride and her family rests the decision as to whether the wedding shall be simple or elaborate. Next comes the choice of bridesmaids and ushers, the color scheme of the occasion, the list of guests, etc. Invitations should always be sent out not later than two weeks, or earlier than a month, before the date set for the ceremony. To be correct they must be engraved on heavy unglazed paper, folded once in the center to fit in its envelope. On this envelope only the name of the person for whom it is intended is written. This is left unsealed and put into a second envelope which is sealed, properly directed and sent through the mail or by messenger. One of the newest forms of invitations uses but one envelope but this innovation is but slowly making its way.

The woman who does the correct thing never economizes on invitations. To group the names of parents and one or more unmarried daughters on the same envelope, or to address an invitation to "Mr. and Mrs. West and family" is considered to be in very questionable taste.

Husband and wife need but one invitation which can be addressed to "Mr. and Mrs. West." If there are two or more unmarried daughters they can be grouped together and the envelope addressed to "The Misses West;" if there is more than one son old enough to be invited, they also need have but one invitation and the envelope can be addressed to "The Messrs. West."

Most of the burdens of a fashionable wedding rest upon the family of the bride. The prospective groom has very little to worry about after he has asked his ushers and best man. The only expenses that he should assume in connection with the ceremony are the check he sends to the officiating clergyman, another to the organist and a substantial tip to the sexton for opening the church. He sends the bride her bouquet and pays for the flowers carried by the bridesmaids and often gives souvenirs to his ushers in the shape of cuff-links or scarf-pins.

The bride's family pay for the floral decorations used in the church and if special soloists are engaged or an elaborate musical program given they should also pay for that. It is unnecessary to add that they also pay for the wedding invitations and announcement cards, the wedding breakfast, the motor cars used by the bridal party and the souvenirs given by the bride to her bridesmaids.

A few years ago at the conventional wedding breakfast all the guests were seated at small tables with a larger one for the bridal party, but this made a great deal of trouble and was impossible except in very large rooms so that now in the majority of cases the refreshments are served from a buffet, with perhaps a single table where sit the bridal party, the minister and the bride and groom's parents. To the other guests the refreshments are passed by waiters assisted by some of the men guests. Aside from the presence of the bride and groom, a wedding reception is very like an afternoon reception except that there are always more men present than any hostess can succeed in capturing for the ordinary daylight "At Home."

As soon as the bridal party returns from the church, or if the ceremony is performed in the home as soon as the religious service is over, the newly-made husband and wife should station themselves at one end of the drawing-room, while the bridesmaids and maid of honor, if there is one, should take their stand near the happy couple. The bride's mother, being the hostess of the affair, should stand somewhere near the door to greet the guests as soon as they enter the room. With her may stand the bridegroom's father who should introduce her to all the friends of his family that she does not know, while she performs a like ceremony in regard to her daughter's friends who are unknown to him. Sometimes the bridegroom's mother and the bride's father stand near the bridal party at the other end of the room, while the ushers busy themselves in escorting guests to offer their congratulations to the bride and groom.

If the wedding is to be at all large and there are to be as many as four bridesmaids, it is well to think out a scheme so that there may be harmony in the bridesmaids' frocks and also the decorations of the church and the house. Flower schemes are lovely when they are well carried out. A daffodil wedding with the bridesmaids all dressed in palest yellow is charming, and so is a pink and white wedding with pink and white tulips or sweet peas. A rose wedding with the bridesmaids' frocks shading from a rich American Beauty tint to the palest cloth of gold and each girl carrying a matching bunch of roses, or a sweet peas' wedding where the frocks are made in the different shades of those attractive flowers. The rainbow color scheme for the bridesmaids is not new, but it is always successful. In this case each frock is of the palest shades of the colors of the spectrum so arranged that they shade down to the white dress of the bride.

Rice is seldom thrown nowadays at the happy pair as they depart on their wedding trip for there have been so many accidents to the eyes of both bride and groom due to a blow from a carelessly-aimed particle of the grain. When the newly-married couple retire to change their clothes the ushers, the bridesmaids and a few intimate friends cluster at the foot of the stairs, and confetti or bags of paper rose leaves or trays heaped with the real petals of the fragrant flower are passed to them with which to shower the newmade husband and wife as they descend the stairs and run through the hall to the waiting motor.

As the bride comes down the stairs with her husband she sometimes flings her wedding bouquet towards the bridesmaids and if she is thoughtful she divides it into two or three portions so as to give more than one girl the bit of luck it is said to bring. And the bridegroom has even been known to fling his boutonniere towards one of the ushers who, if he is wedded to his bachelor existence, is sometimes ungallant enough to dodge it, as the superstition is that the person who catches the bridal flowers will wed within the year.

When a widow or divorcee marries again the invitations are very much the same as those sent out for the first ceremony except that her married name prefixed by her Christian name is used on the invitation in exactly the same way as in an ordinary wedding invitation. Sometimes only her first name is used with her married name in brackets beneath it, but this is not often done. If the bride is young, such invitations are issued in the name of her parents, but if she has no immediate relatives, or has passed her first youth she sends out invitations in her own name.

At a second marriage no woman, of course, wears a veil or the conventional white satin wedding gown, or should she have bridesmaids, but she can, if she likes, have a single maid of honor. A man on making a second marriage follows precisely the same etiquette as that which he observed at his first marriage.

A prospective bride should always send a note of thanks for all wedding presents within a day or two after she has received them. It is not considered at all courteous to wait until after the return from the wedding trip to send these notes of thanks.

would peek out through the lace curtains and see who it was and then not go to the door. The parson's salary was so small that the wife's brother had to clothe the family and help them in other ways. Some of the church people were wealthy but the church was too poor to hire a sexton and the parson had to do the sexton's work and then people called him crazy. I can tell you some more if you want, worse yet, but, nevertheless, gospel truth.

Don't be too hard on Mother of Seven. There are such mothers as she had. I know for I had one. You who have a good mother have a treasure that is priceless. I never knew what a mother's love was although the woman who gave me birth lived until I was fourteen years old. When I have seen good mothers and their children together I have often said, "Why could not my mother have been like that?"

Irish, I don't believe you are spoiling your boy. I think when he gets older and understands such things better he will outgrow his fear of the dark. If you punish him you may make a wreck of his nervous system. Do not mind what the neighbors think. You cannot suit them all anyway.

Sometime ago someone asked what the sisters thought about women wearing overalls while at work on the farm, referring to a certain Bible passage. Even from Christ's teachings we learn that circumstances alter cases. I see no harm in wearing them when work can be done safer and easier but I don't believe in a girl wearing boys' or men's clothes in public places as many do nowadays. However, I think bloomers are better and they are a woman's garment anyway, so if your conscience troubles you when you wear overalls, try the bloomers.

I wish the Stuffing Blue Chums would tell us where they got that name and what it means. We have a mountain in this state called Ginger Blue and I wondered if they lived in a place known as Stuffing Blue. Anyway, the toys they made are cute and I would like the fat, woolly lamb.

I planned to write something last summer and tell of some things I made for Christmas but time flew along and it was too late but I'll try to do better next later on, after I see what luck I have with this.

I don't think there is much use telling anyone how to keep her house. I say keep it as you like and can be happiest and never mind what someone else thinks. They know better than to say much to me for they know I will tell them to go to work and do it for me if they don't like my methods.

VERMONTER.

Vermonter,—and Others.—Don't wait until December to write about Christmas gifts for your letter could not be printed before February or March, and that's rather late. Next time, don't put it off for such letters are a great help to the majority of us.—Ed.

PITTSFIELD, 427 North Monroe St., ILL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have just finished reading my third copy of COMFORT. No, I live in good old Illinois. The fact is I just never happened to get hold of a copy of COMFORT before. Our reading table is covered with weekly and monthly magazines on the most scientific subjects as friend Husband likes that kind of reading and I have been too busy with my home affairs and little girls to devote much time to magazine reading but one day a small girl stopped at my door and wanted my subscription for COMFORT and now that day goes down as a Perfect Day. I thoroughly enjoy all departments but the Sisters' Corner interests me the most. After reading letters from all parts of the globe, I wondered if I were the only reader interested in astrology or the influence of the planets on the human family. I have been a student in that science for years and find it invaluable in determining the character and temperament of newcomers into the home or neighborhood, by just finding out their birthdate you can tell whether they will be congenial or whether you will care to become intimate with them. The knowledge helps you to keep from "rubbing people the wrong way" and hence preserves harmony. I find the study of great help in bringing up my girls, I understand them better and can be of more help to them. Many mothers have come to me in despair because they were at their "wit's end" how to manage their children. I do not mean to boast as these mothers were scoffers at first but came as a last resort and found out that they did not understand their children at all. This is not fortune telling or a new religion, but a science as old as time. The wise men of ancient times made all their deductions by means of the stars. I would be glad to correspond with any who are interested in this subject and I believe it is the custom to enclose stamp.

It seems proper to introduce myself. I am the wife of a photographer and we live in an inland city in Illinois. We have two little girls, a freshman, age 14, and one 12, and we are "pals." We are all lovers of the great out of doors and spend every available hour in the car or tent beside a stream or river absorbing all that Mother Nature has to spare when the weather permits.

Hoping I have not bored you with this lecture,

Most sincerely, MRS. EVA SHINN.

WHETSTONE, KY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND READERS:

COMFORT has been a regular visitor to our home for several years and a most welcome one indeed. The small children and the older ones love it and I feel just all right when I have it to read. My husband doesn't read very much but he likes the editorials and I read them to him if he is too tired to feel inclined to read.

I enjoy reading such letters as Dr. Defolar's. Why can't we have more like them?

Mrs. Gardner, I do not believe in Sunday baseball games but as you said about your place, it was quite the rage in our vicinity last summer. My little boy, ten years old, has watched them play on Saturdays and he seemed to think he must attend the games on Sunday too, but I told him the Sabbath was God's day and he was easily persuaded to give up the idea of going. We have Sunday School near our home during the spring, summer and fall months but the winter is usually too cold.

If the sisters who have nervous trouble like to ride horseback I think they will find this a great help, or, at least, I did. I have had a nervous trouble for several years but ride a good deal during the summer and I feel almost cured of nervousness, but when winter comes and the roads are bad and the weather cold, I don't ride very much and I am troubled with nervousness again.

If I could write as interesting a letter as some of the sisters I know Mrs. Wilkinson would not throw it in the waste-basket, but she seems like such a lovable, motherly soul—I always think of my own dear mother now gone to live with God, when I think of her—I know she will read it with a kindly smile and do with it whatever she thinks is best.

Mothers who have several children in school know what a lot of work it takes to keep them there. I know I overdo almost every day as I am not very strong and it takes a lot of work to keep six children in school. Our school closes in a few days but they will only rest one week then take up their studies again as I always teach them through the winter months. I don't think we should let them lay their books aside when school is over as it is a help to them to study during the winter.

Sincerest wishes for all. MRS. J. S. GUINN.

Mrs. Guinn.—Thank you for saying such delightful things about me. You couldn't have paid me a greater compliment than saying I reminded you of your own mother. I wish you would get into the habit of going out in the winter as well as in the summer and believe you would be less nervous if you would. Dress warmly and go out for a walk, regardless of cold weather, and take the children with you.—Ed.

DUNDEE, OREGON.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Please admit a mother from the Far West. I live near Portland, Oregon, the city of roses. However, I am a devoted reader of dear old COMFORT.

In the August number I read a letter written by a young man of Texas, who signed his name "Home Lover." His letter was in reply to "B" of Goshen, Calif., and as I read and re-read it I said to myself, if America could just have one hundred thousand homes such as I imagine he has, what a change would come over our dear country. I am sure that "Home Lover" has the right kind of a home, and a mother that has influenced him for high ideals and when the time comes for him to choose a wife and the mother of his children, it will be some good girl who has been raised by a sensible mother. Then her children can rise up and call her blessed. He too will praise her.

"Home Lover" has repeated what one great man has said, "Without home and home training our very institutions would crumble and soon decay." And as the days go by and the number of business women and motor cars increase, the number of real homes decrease. I can see from my own windows the signs of decreasing pleasures of the home and fireside. As I sit in my pleasant country home with electric lights, telephone, warm fires, good books, magazines, the daily paper to read, and last but no means least, my family around the library table, contented and happy, my neighbors are starting out with their cars, going, going, any place to get away from home. Even the small children are not contented to stay at home, but begin by saying, "Where are we going tonight?" or, "Mamma let's ask daddy to take us to the show."

So I believe the very heart of the home is being torn away by the automobile and shows, and the attraction the business world has for the mothers.

I say that the four walls of a home is the biggest place in the world if it has little children in it and a queen mother to reign and rule over all. I have felt many times that I did not know enough to train my children as I should but I can in my declining years thank God that I always did the best I knew and now that I have lived many years and have seen eight sons and daughters grow to manhood and womanhood, I say of a surety that I have but few regrets and have done what I could.

With best wshes to all,

MRS. ELLEN DLLINGER.

BERGOLZ, OHIO.

MRS. WILKINSON:

If the more critical sisters will not bother asking me if my work is done I will venture in for I am not afraid of the waste-basket since it has no voice. As a general rule I am not very lucky so if this gets into print I shall consider myself fortunate for once. They say fat people are not often troubled with melancholy and I don't intend to shed any tears if my luck fails again. We surely enjoy COMFORT. You will think so when we have three years paid in advance. I look at the crochet patterns first of all, then the Sisters' Corner. How often I have wished there was another letter in the space that was filled with a baby's picture. Although I think all babies are nice, yet no one thinks so much so as their own mothers.

I can't remember names but I want to agree with the ones that are swatting the movies. Has not this awful crime wave come upon this country since the people went movie mad? I have seen my own boys playing highway robbery after attending plays of that kind, and trying to do some of the daring acts the heroes performed. We have done what we could to discourage them until they seldom attend any more and seldom play pictures at home either. All children might not take them that way but why not try to save some other boy from the reform school? In speaking of the half-dressed women, we don't have to go to the movies to see that. It is a common sight on the street. I am not condemning georgette and other thin material for waists, if a proper amount of underclothing is worn underneath. You know Adam and Eve did not realize they were naked until they had eaten the forbidden fruit but as soon as they came in the presence of God they realized they needed clothes.

Curious Easter Customs

By C. L. Cheever

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

IT is an interesting speculation at the Easter season to consider from what distance the poetic fancies of the distant nations of remote times have filtered down to decorate the festival of a God they never knew.

The old, old association of the waning moon, returning in its own time to light the darkness, with the night of winter and the return of the sun and of new life in the spring, is back of the many trinkets that ornament the confectioner's window today.

To the mysterious development of life in an egg is easily seen the symbol of the revival of nature and the springing forth of life. The origin of Easter eggs seems to be a mixture of Christian and pagan legend for we find these egg stories coming from different countries, and in a variety of forms.

In ancient Persia there was a legend of two jealous brothers who had a good deal of influence in the creation of things. One brother made an egg containing good spirits, and the other produced one full of evil demons; and they broke the two together, so that good and evil became mixed in the world. Since that time the present-day Persians on a certain festival in March present each other with colored eggs in memory of these two brothers. From this may come our similar Easter custom.

Another story tells of a prince who sent to a certain princess on Easter a wonderful and huge iron egg. She thought it a practical joke and was so hurt with the gift that she dashed it to the floor. To her surprise, the force of the fall caused the egg to fly open, and on a lining of beautiful crystal lay a golden yolk. She took up the gold ball, and upon opening it found that it contained a crown of rubies; this opened also and there lay a betrothal ring of magnificent diamonds. The name of the prince nor the time in which he lived is not known, neither do we know more than this about the German princess; but the iron egg is surely a reality for it may be seen in the Museum of Berlin.

Another symbol of Easter quite as familiar as the egg is the Easter hare. From Egypt and India comes the association of the hare with the Easter season. Hindu and Japanese artists painted the hare across the moon's disc, while the Chinese represent the moon as a rabbit pounding rice in a mortar. The suggestion of purity and innocence of the white coat of the Easter rabbit is wholly a modern addition.

In Scotland a popular belief was that one must wear for the first time, on Easter Sunday, a new article of dress, to ensure good fortune in love-affairs during the year. Can this be the origin of the Easter bonnet?

The Easter festival in very early days was introduced by fasting one day only—the Friday before, known as Good Friday. Later the feast was extended to forty hours and afterwards the period was prolonged to forty days.

In England, Good Friday and hot-cross buns are synonymous. The bun seems to be an institution which none will try to upset, and the devouring of them is universal among all classes.

Long ago hot-cross buns were sold at the peep o' day on Good Friday on the streets of London by little lads who trudged along carrying baskets filled with fresh buns covered with sugar and marked with a cross. As they sold their goods they piped in high, boyish treble their trade cry, "Hot-Cross Buns—one a penny, two a penny—Hot-Cross Buns."

A loaf of bread baked on Good Friday was supposed to cure various ailments.

In former times Easter week was celebrated with many sports, which were enjoyed by young and old. The children made gifts of colored eggs, which they rolled down hill till they broke; the one whose egg held out longest was the lucky one, and claimed all the eggs. This old custom is the reason for the egg-rolling in our own capital. In Washington in April the spring odors and flowers seem suddenly to flood the gardens and lawns, and Easter Monday is the great day for the Washington babies, for there are hundreds of children who on this special afternoon storm the grounds of the White House for their annual frolic.

As a part of the joy and freedom of Easter time, music is indispensable.

The first Easter hymns were sung in the old cloisters. There seems little in the life of a monk to call forth much poetry or song, but he had the Old Testament from which to draw inspiration so that his whole nature burst forth in religious expression.

The earliest Easter hymn of which we have any knowledge takes us back to the fourth century. Its author is St. Ambrose, and it was probably written about 340:

"This is the very day of God,—
Serene with holy light it came,—
In which the stream of sacred blood
Swept over the world's crime and shame.

* * * *

"What can be ever more sublime!
That grace might meet the guilt of time.
Love doth the bonds of fear undo,
And death restores our life anew!"

There are many other hymns which are singularly beautiful and express the passionate love of the monk for Christ and the Church.

The hymns of later times are broader in thought and more elaborate in musical form, and the Easter music which is now sung in the churches is among the most beautiful ever written.

Easter Sunday was formerly called the "Sunday of Joy," and today the thought of a modern Easter Sunday pictures a bright morning, birds singing, and we never forget the flowers and music of the Easter service.

"The world itself keeps Easter Day,
An Easter larks are singing;
And Easter flow'rs are blooming gay
And Easter buds are springing.
The Lord of all things lives anew,
And all His works are living, too!"

Comfort's League of Cousins

should say not! She is a lady and demands the best of everything. Perhaps she might eat perfumed stationery, though, and if ever I get such a letter I am going to try her out. She suffers from indigestion, and maybe a little of the right sort of paper is all that she needs. She is most particular and will eat only out of a clean dish and her food must be cut in small pieces. She demands fresh water every time she drinks, and her bed must be "made up" fresh every morning. If I don't give her good service, she simply raises the dickens. She bleats and makes all kinds of fuss. I tried to shirk once and gee, her noise almost drove me crazy! So you readily see I have become virtually her private maid. If space permitted I could write quite a lengthy story about Miss Nanny Goat.

As Doc Mason will not return, I brought my boss with me when I came back here to Camp 33 Hospital. She seems well pleased with the new surroundings—which are much rougher than the Shaver Lake country.

Uncle, business is bad for me! It seems as though the boys are getting very careful lately. Ever since that safety first man came here and gave an illustrated lecture it seems that no one is getting hurt—they quit breaking their arms, legs or ribs. He ruined my business; it's a good thing I'm on a salary! I now have loads of idle time on my hands, so if some of the cousins care to write, I will do my best to answer with an interesting letter. You see Big Creek is way up in the high Sierra mountains. Fresno, the nearest city, is sixty miles away. One surely gets lonesome in the mountains. I would particularly like to hear from young ladies between 18 and 80. I am a young bachelor of twenty-five—a pretty good fellow, but shy on brains.

Nanny sends her best to Billy.

I am,

Your nephew and Nanny's servant,
CHARLES SCHMIDT.

Charles, you might think that Billy would like a letter like yours with the news of your subservience to your young and charming boss. But no; instead your letter only acted to rile him considerably. "Why, Uncle Lisha," said he, "should anyone think it surprising that a goat should want 'the best of everything'? I think the tone of Cousin Charles' letter peculiar and unappreciative." And then Bill followed with a dissertation on the intellect of the goatly race and his own particular family. He especially stressed the career of his uncle (of whom I have heard so many times!) who was Professor of Goatology in a Western college. Yet, of course it is true, Charles, that Bill is rather extraordinary. He never touches a tin can—unless to empty it—and he is not by nature fond of paper. He only developed this habit as a result of his taste for letters and all form of literary effort. As to your own Nanny's possible fondness for perfumed stationery, you will have plenty of opportunity to test this after your letter, with its correspondence appeal, has appeared in COMFORT. You may not receive the five or six thousand letters that Cousin Jack Wilcox writes me he has on his hands, but you are certain to get enough to give Nanny's digestive powers a good tryout. As a physician, Charles, you will know how to treat any bad case of paper collywobbles Nanny may develop from over-consumption of letters steeped in rose or violet or "quelque fleurs." From experience with Billy I recommend three drops of turpentine on a lump of sugar—but this is only a layman's prescription. Billy has asked me to return the kind regards sent him by Miss Nanny and says to tell her she has his encouragement in her efforts to stand up for her rights as a member of a great and glorious and unappreciated race.

ALLSTON, P. O. Box 22, MASS.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND ALL THE COUSINS:

I wish to apologize to all the readers for the exaggerated statements in my letter on French versus American beauty published in the January issue of dear old COMFORT. I did not give it enough thought. I realize now that we have a few really beautiful women and girls in the old U. S.—and readers of COMFORT, too, although I have never seen Billy's album. Yes, Uncle Lisha, I am 100 per cent. American, by birth and every other way. You have the right idea, Uncle, about the American girl, but you misunderstood me: I mean something more than face when I speak of beauty. I think a pretty girl should mean a cheerful nature, and many of the southern French girls have a most sunny disposition, which lots of the American girls lack. Please do not misunderstand me: I believe there are all sorts of people everywhere; all French girls are not saints, but there are pure women in France as well as in America. But I feel that I committed an enormity in my last letter in saying all American girls are plain-looking. I did not mean all, but many—or perhaps I should have said some.

I received many hateful letters from some of the readers of my other letter. Now Uncle, I believe a real, naturally pretty girl cannot be thus hateful, as her nature must be kind and pretty if her face is naturally beautiful. I do not mean by "beautiful" a doll look, but a clean, pure face with Nature's simple lines, and health, of course. When I speak here, and in my other letter, of plain-looking people, I mean their nature as well as their made-up faces are ugly. Let me explain, or perhaps you can do it better for me, Uncle Lisha. Anyway, this is what I mean: Some girls are considered very plain-looking, but to me they are beautiful, for they have a pure, genuine face and sweet nature. Yet everywhere girls with this sweet, kind, cheerful nature are few and far between. I have proof that few girls know what kindness means—if so, they would be kinder in their judgment of me. They knew I was all wrong, for it is true I was not very kind in my last letter. But now I wish to come making amends and asking forgiveness of all, for I did not really mean what I wrote in the spirit the readers took it.

I have been greatly misunderstood, and I am, of course, for America, first, last and all the time. But truth comes first with me and facts make truth. I say we have many, or "some" girls in America that are as different from the cheerful French girls as black is from white. And to prove some of the things I say and have said about the "beautiful" nature of American girls, I will say that half of the letters I got in reply to my letter in COMFORT were from girls who—well, I'll not say, but the letters, at least, were very hateful and mean and anything but sympathetic. As I was wrong, why not be kind and feel sorry for me? The French girls show a friendliness—an amity—that is lasting, while I think that some of the American girls very easily show their unpleasant, unfriendly nature and looks at every little thing which turns up. Many showed this nature in their letters to me. I must say that I received three letters that were most human and must have come from wonderful souls. Such understanding letters I highly value. Of course we have pure girls and very pretty ones in America, but I felt that I was speaking about 50 per cent. of the city as well as the country girls. The kind I wrote about I find mostly in the city.

There are a few facts which I have learned from much study and which I challenge the readers of COMFORT to disprove: Nine out of every ten flirtations, "affairs," entanglements, etc., are instigated by the so-called "fair" sex. Women have a definite, well-thought-out plan of attack in which eyes, voice and ankles play principal parts. Men are always reticent and often sheepish about such things, but women and girls glory in them. I mean this, but I don't mean that all women and girls are like this—only the class that under their made-up faces are plain and ugly in nature as well. That men are changeable and fickle I do not deny, but such is girl's second nature, except a few. I think the rare girls in America ought to do what I am trying to accomplish: make war on the other worthless kind. Let the real worthwhile girls show and teach the others how to live. I challenge the "cheap" girls to come forward and show their right to be such specimens. When I say "cheap" girls I do not mean those who are poor, but the tricksters, flirts and vain simpletons. It's up to the true-hearted womanhood to make our girls really beautiful and true-hearted, as after all I believe what the old song says: "A man is what a woman makes him"—and the making should start with the mother of that man. I wonder how many kind, true-hearted souls will read this if Uncle Lisha will print it? Give me a good answer, Uncle, for I am your true-hearted nephew.

True love to all,

JACK WILCOX.

Jack, I am mighty glad to place your apologies before the cousins and I am also glad to know I will not have to submit any samples from Bill's album to get you to grant the fact that there are many beautiful American girls and COMFORT cousins. And now, Jack, what remains is to have you become convinced that American girls know what kindness and cheerfulness are, and that these desirable and not so rare qualities are not confined to girls across the pond or to those maidens dwelling in sunny southern France. Jack, the south shores of those European countries bordering on the Mediterranean have never been famed, so far as I know, for the sweet tempers of their populations—either male or female. If you are inclined to doubt this, ask those who know well the towns of southern Italy and France. Warm and sunny, perhaps, yes, Jack; but very sunny climates often have very sudden and destructive storms. There is a distinct influence of climate upon racial types and characteristics. Perhaps it was cloudy and cold in Massachusetts when you wrote your first letter!

To speak mildly, Jack, and as kindly as you seem to demand that all who criticise you should speak, I do not think you have any basis for indicting the mass of our feminine readers by saying that "few girls know what kindness means." You give as your proof of this strong assertion that you have received so many letters that were "mean and anything but sympathetic." Now, Jack, my boy, you claim to be a student of humanity—or at least of the feminine half. Your study should have taught you that we are almost certain to get back what we give in life. Sometimes it comes back promptly—and sometimes only after many days. Sometimes we get our compensatory returns directly—and sometimes, as in your case, they descend upon us by mail! It requires a sunnier temperament than most of us can muster, except when the years and life and love have made us tolerant, to return quick and cheerful kindness when our toes are trod upon and we are mentally or physically buffeted. The ideal, Jack, the teaching of Him who was the Ideal Man, is to turn the other cheek. You and I know that this is not yet done in the slow struggle upward of humanity. When it is done, all our big and little life problems will have found solution. It will be all sun and shining faces. But until this comes to pass you must not expect to call our girls "ugly, cranky and hateful" and then complain that you have not received sunny, friendly smiles in return under the flaps of envelopes. You must remember, Jack, that if you have been "greatly misunderstood," you gave the cousins nothing but your written words to understand you by. If you did not quite mean all you said, I have faith enough in the faces in Bill's album to know that now when you "come making amends and asking forgiveness of all," you will get it—unless, Jack, because of the one paragraph in your letter which is a little unforgiving in itself. If you have been attacked at any past time in any "definite, well-thought out plan" by some ugly, unpleasant American girl, I am glad you have escaped up to now. Otherwise your sunny disposition might have failed under the strain! You must not mind my teasing you a bit, Jack. I might do much worse. For it is you who started all your troubles—and they are not over yet, I fear!

KIMBLES, PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I have been reading with interest the letter from Jack Wilcox in the January issue of dear old COMFORT. I appreciate his mistaken sincerity, but in rebuttal I must give some reasons why French girls are no more beautiful than those right here in our own U. S. I was born in the country, but did not appreciate the life nor the country girls and longed for a career as an actor in the white lights of Broadway in the big city of New York. My dreams were finally realized and for three years I have been facing the spotlight in well-known stage productions. In the course of these three years I have had the opportunity to meet actresses of all types—French, American and Italian, and from both city and country environments. I have had a chance to study them and the men who associate with them. Now I say this: The actress, taking her as a class, is not as good-looking as Cousin Jack and many others might mistakenly think. The make-up of actresses on the stage is necessary, as otherwise the glare of the footlights would give their faces a horrible whiteness. There is no real beauty on the stage, as nature never intended a woman to buy her complexion in a drug store, but that she should get it as the girls in the country get it: from pure air, plenty of sleep, fresh milk and clean, healthy living generally. These things are impossible in the case of a stage career. Only last season I was on the road with a musical comedy that traveled through the greater part of the U. S. In some places we stopped for a month, in some for a week, in others but a day or two. As I got into the smaller country places and realized what really good-looking girls there were in such towns, I began instinctively to compare them in my mind with the dozen French and English girls there were in our company. The result was never in doubt and the country girl was easily the winner. And so I say to Cousin Jack he has made a mistake—and one that really deserves sympathy if it has shut his eyes to what beauty really is and where it really lies. Of course some girls are deceptions, perhaps even in the country, although I have not been unfortunate enough to meet any of this sort; but surely no man is an angel—at least the kind that I have seen waiting around for the curtain to drop—"Stage Door Johnnies" being the pet name that belongs to this kind of bird. Perhaps Jack's eyesight was a little affected by shell shock, or maybe Gay Paree was too much for him. Let him look around again and go out in the country to do it. Some may be plain, but even then they are the real stuff—and you don't have to scratch the paint away to find the true grain. In other words, Jack will be sure not to find there painted and powdered rhinestone-bedecked chewing-gum artists who are mostly clothes and paint walking around with nothing real inside. The girl who paints can do it for but one reason—her complexion is not attractive without it. This may deceive some, but the real city girl does not do this, and the country girl has no need of rouge box and lipstick, because nature is always at work making her pink-cheeked and beautiful without these cosmetic aids. I may be wrong, but anyway I give my opinion taken from my experience in the world at large. I will appreciate hearing from those who agree with me—and those who don't. I think some French girl got hold of Jack and dazzled him—and he never got a chance to get a good look. Maybe he'll see better some day. With best love to you, Uncle, and to all the cousins, I am, Always your nephew, IRVING HANNERS.

Yes, Irving, what you express sensibly and clearly to us of your experience is just another instance of things being very different on the inside looking out, than they are from the outside looking in. In reality, so-called "stage beauties" exist as much in imagination as do those aloe-eyed sylphs Jack wrote us about. Truly natural feminine beauty, untouched and unspoiled and originating under right conditions of country living, cannot fail to be far superior to any artificial painted beauty offered by the stage. One might just as well expect the studio-produced stage scenery to equal the natural color and splendor of a farm landscape. And artificiality of life must always make for artificiality of thought and feeling. The more simply we live and think, the more truly beautiful ourselves and our lives must become. This is actually a law, and its infraction marks all that is making for unhappiness and wrong in our present complex civilization.

Irving, I see that you yourself, despite your travels and stage career, write from a town I happen to know slightly—a tiny village dropped in the wilds of wildest Pike County along the Lackawaxen River where I have often fished and swam. If you are down in this secluded and beautiful country, Irv., I'm willing to wager one of Bill's bran muffins you are there because you have tired of spot and footlights and a life which has "nothing real inside" of it. Stick to the country and the country girls, Irving. I believe it is because you have gone back there that you are able to write so sensibly, and it is because you have seen both sides of a theater drop-curtain that you know what is true and best to choose. When it comes to staging beautiful effects—in humanity, or in woods and fields and streams, Old Lady Nature is right on the job she has held so many years. Believe me, Irv., she can beat any movie director or stage manager that ever bossed a reel or put on a play.

SCOTCH GROVE, R. R. 1, IOWA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I thought I would write to you. I am a new friend. I like to read your letters fine. I go to school. I am in the fifth grade. I am thirteen years old. I ride my pony to school. Her name is Topsy. She is brown, with a white stripe down her face. There are twenty-four pupils in my school. I have four brothers and two sisters and me. There are seven children in the family. I am the youngest of the family. We live on a farm. We live in Scotch Grove, Iowa. The name of our school is The Timber. I have a little niece who died with the flue. Please just save this address, Uncle Lisha, so that the cousins can write to me. I am send-until I graduate, for without you to help me bear the responsibility, I should not dare to take such a step."

Mr. Rosevelt smiled again.

"You try to make the obligation appear all your own; but I share it, nevertheless; and I think you and I will be far happier away from the unpleasant influences which have surrounded us during the past year. I am quite anticipating the change, I assure you. Now you must go to rest. You look more like a ghost than a star just now; and my heart has been deeply pained tonight for the suffering that you have had to endure; but I believe it will yet be made up to you in some way."

He bent suddenly down and touched her forehead with his lips; and Star, with a low-spoken "good night," went away with a sorely aching heart, indeed, but greatly comforted by his sympathy.

Jacob Rosevelt locked the door after her, and went back to the table where he had been sitting when she came to him.

Opening the drawer, he took out a package of papers and letters, which he carefully looked over.

When he had read them all, he selected a portion, tore them into atoms, and throwing them into the grate where there was a slow fire, watched them until they had burned to ashes, with a white, stern face. Then he sat down again, and wrote far into the night.

The next morning when Mrs. Blunt went up to see how Star was feeling she found her room empty.

A little note lying upon the bed now attracted her attention, and she eagerly pounced upon it.

It was directed to her, and with trembling finbers she opened it, and read:

"DEAR MRS. BLUNT: Something has occurred which makes it impossible for me to remain here any longer, and I am going away to take care of myself. You have always been very kind to me, and I thank you very much for it, and shall never forget it. Some time I hope to see you again, and I trust you will always think kindly of

"STELLA GLADSTONE."

The good woman sat down and wept bitter tears over this brief note; then she went down to tell the news to her master. She met John Mellen in the hall, who had come with the intelligence that Mr. Rosevelt left the lodge early that morning, and he handed Mr. Richards a note which the old gentleman had left for him.

CHAPTER XXI.

FRUITLESS EFFORTS.

Mr. Richards and his family were thrown into considerable confusion by the double surprise which this morning revealed to them.

Mrs. Richards, however, found it difficult to conceal her satisfaction at the turn events had taken. She kept her own counsel regarding her knowledge of what had transpired during the interview between her husband and the young lord; neither did she consider it necessary to mention the stormy scene which had occurred at the Lodge the previous evening, in which she was so prominent an actor.

"Josephine shall have everything her own way now," she thought, exultantly; "at all events, that girl shall never triumph over my daughter by becoming Lady Carrol."

Mr. Richards declared that he should go immediately in search of the fugitives. He could not endure the thought that the delicate young girl and feeble old man should go out into the world to earn their own living, for this he supposed they would be obliged to do, since what little money he knew Star to be possessed of could not support them both a great while.

But Mrs. Richards indignantly objected to this proceeding.

"Let them alone," she said, angrily; "they will not thank you for your trouble, and doubtless would refuse to return if you should succeed in finding them. I am sure they have shown precious little gratitude for what we have already done for them. Uncle Jacob says in his note that it has been very unpleasant for him here, and if such is the case, let him go where he will fare better if he can find such a place. As for that proud-spirited, independent girl, I never want to see her again; I am glad to be rid of her."

Mr. Richards did not reply to this tirade, but he felt very sorrowful, for every day only seemed to reveal some new trait of selfishness and heartlessness in his wife, which served to detract from his respect for her.

Nothing of all this, however, was mentioned before their guests, and when after breakfast Lord Carrol sought his host in the library to make further arrangements for an interview with Star, he was astonished and dismayed by the intelligence which he received regarding her secret departure with Mr. Rosevelt.

"Have you any idea where they can have gone?" he asked, with a very pale, anxious face.

"Not the slightest," Mr. Richards answered, "and I am deeply concerned about the affair. You will believe me, I am sure, when I tell you that I admire Miss Gladstone exceedingly, although I am obliged to confess with shame that her sojourn with us has not been made as pleasant as it might have been."

Mr. Richards made this confession with a lowering brow and in a stern tone.

"I judged that she was not happy here from something that she dropped last night," Lord Carrol said, gravely. "And," he added, with evident embarrassment, "it is a delicate topic to touch upon, but I believe plain dealing is best—she also stated that it is generally believed in your household that I am here as a suitor for Miss Richards' hand. I trust, however, that there has been no such misunderstanding as this. I enjoyed a very pleasant month at Long Branch with both your wife and daughter. Perhaps I sought their society more than might have been deemed proper unless I had serious intentions; but this was owing to the fact that I discovered Mrs. Richards to be of English birth, and knowing something of her friends abroad, it seemed to become a bond between us, out of which a friendship naturally sprang. Mrs. Richards very kindly invited me to make one of a party here, and I accepted her invitation—I give you my word of honor upon it—with only thoughts of friendship and the pleasure of meeting congenial company, and with the intention, if she ever came abroad, of returning her hospitality in the same spirit. I hope—I trust, my dear sir, that my coming here thus has not been misconstrued, or placed Miss Richards in an awkward position."

"It is all right, my young friend," he responded, heartily. "I am satisfied you have been perfectly honorable, although I must confess that I was greatly astonished last night to learn that Star was the object of your affections. I regret sincerely the misunderstanding that has arisen between you, but we will do what we can to find the missing girl, and I trust that then it will not take long to effect a reconciliation."

"Thank you," the young lord said, but he looked very grave, for he did not feel as if it would be a very easy matter to find Star.

However, he resolved to devote all his time before the day set for his return should arrive in searching for her; and acting at once upon this decision, he sought Mrs. Richards and Josephine, telling them that, much as he regretted doing so, he should be obliged to cut his visit short, as business of importance called him unexpectedly away.

Josephine was bitterly disappointed and chagrined, for she was as yet in total ignorance as to the cause of his departure, and Mrs. Richards for the moment was rendered speechless from indignation. She had not once thought that he would go away before the expiration of his week.

"What under the sun is the matter with Lord Carrol this morning, mamma? He does not appear like himself at all; and what has possessed him to go away so soon?" Josephine cried, nearly ready to weep as the door closed upon the man she loved, and she was left alone with her mother.

Mrs. Richards then related what she had overheard the previous evening, and told her, also, of her subsequent interview with Star and Mr. Rosevelt, and the news that had come to them that morning of their flight.

Josephine listened to her in dumb amazement, hardly able to comprehend the romantic story.

"That girl has done nothing but set everybody by the ears ever since she entered this house," she burst forth, at length, quivering in every nerve with anger. "Lord Carrol in love with her! I cannot comprehend it, and I think it is scandalous for him to confess it, after the marked attention that he paid me at Long Branch."

"I think so, too," Mrs. Richards echoed, but rather faintly, for she knew how Josephine had almost been thrown at him, so to speak.

"Well, I am glad she is gone," the excited girl continued. "I hope now that we shall be able to take some comfort. She bewitched papa with her pretty face, her music, and pretended love of study. She was an artful thing, making herself so conspicuous at school that even the newspapers took it up, and was so puffed up on account of it that her airs were insufferable. It is a mercy that Uncle Jacob lost his fortune before he came to us, or she would have been likely to wheedle him out of it."

"She has been as sly as a fox," commented Mrs. Richards wrathfully, her ire against poor, unoffending Star waxing hotter and hotter, for she was as bitterly disappointed to lose his lordship as a son-in-law as Josephine was to lose him as a husband.

"I never heard anything like it. To think of his being engaged to her, and we never suspecting such a thing! I'll bet," the refined young lady continued, as a bright idea struck her, "that she went away to meet him last Saturday, and that was why she was rigged out so. That must be the secret of her insolence to me. She knew she was soon to become Lady Carrol, and she was trying how it would seem to lord it over me."

"You forget, Josephine," interposed her mother, "that she did not know anything about his title, and so you are all wrong in your surmises."

"True," she replied, somewhat crestfallen; "but when do you suppose he engaged himself to her?"

"I am sure I do not know—very recently, he said. I tried to make her tell me about it last night, but I couldn't get a word out of her. One would have thought, by the way that she faced me, that she was already my Lady Somebody. But I reckon I fixed it so that she will not be at present. I made her think that his lordship had told the story in a way to make her appear as ridiculous as possible, and she has gone away, believing him to be as faithless as it is in the power of man to be;" and the hard-hearted woman threw herself back in her chair with a sigh of satisfaction at the thought.

"It is a shame, anyhow. Everything has gone wrong, and I—I really was fond of him," Josephine confessed, with a passion of tears.

Mrs. Richards' face darkened. She never could tolerate anything which interfered with the desires and whims of her only child.

At this moment a servant entered the room and handed Josephine a note.

She opened it eagerly and read it.

Her face flushed a deep crimson, and, with a passionate gesture, she instantly tore it in two.

"What is it?" questioned her mother.

"It is too dreadful!" the spoiled beauty cried, stamping her foot; "and I believe that girl will be the death of me yet."

"Tell me what it is," persisted Mrs. Richards, growing pale.

"It is a note from Lord Carrol himself," Josephine answered, her cheeks still hot from mortification and anger. "When we were at Long Branch, he noticed this cameo ring that I wear—I happened to put it on the last night that we were there, unfortunately—and he said that it was very much like one which belonged to a friend of his. He appeared rather strangely when he said it, and told me that his friend's name was Archibald Sherbrooke. Of course, I can understand now why he would not say that it had belonged to him. I told him that it was given to me by a relative, and he did not appear like himself after that."

"But how came you by it—who gave it to you?" interrupted her mother, who had never noticed the ring until now, for Josephine had so many trinkets that she could not keep track of them all.

The girl flushed again, guiltily.

"To tell you the truth, it belonged to Stella," she confessed, reluctantly, "and it was such an exquisite little thing that I took a notion to have it. I offered to buy it of her, but she wouldn't hear a word of it, saying she 'prized it too highly as the gift of a friend.' But I was bound to have it, and went to her room one day and took it, and had it made into a ring, for it was in the shape of a pin. Of course I intended to return it some time, but I meant her to understand that a girl in her dependent position had no business to refuse so simple a request. The initials A. S., with two strawberry leaves, their stems crossed, are engraved on it, and I knew, when he described it to me, that it was 'his friend'—or rather himself, as it appears now—who had given it to her. I heartily wish now that I had let it alone. But just listen to this."

Mrs. Richards took the pieces of the note, which she had held crumpled in her hand, and putting them together, read the following:

"Oct. 10th, 188—.

"MISS RICHARDS: Doubtless before you receive this you will have learned that Archibald Sherbrooke—whom I represented to you as my friend, for reasons which you cannot now fail to understand—and Lord Carrol are one and the same person. Under the former name, which was the only one which belonged to me at that time, I became acquainted with Miss Gladstone on shipboard, and was so pleased with her that, at parting, I exchanged souvenirs with her, giving her a little cameo which I prized very highly. It is the same one which you have had made into a ring. When I met Miss Gladstone a short time since she remarked that she had 'lost' my gift; last night she told me how she had 'lost' it, and I would respectfully ask you to send it to the inclosed address, that I may return it to the owner, should I be so happy as to find her.

"Very respectfully,

"ARCHIBALD SHERBROOKE, Bart., and
"LORD CARROL, of Carrolton."

"Why on earth can't you let other folks' things alone, Josephine?" cried Mrs. Richards, when her daughter had finished reading this formal note, and feeling almost faint from mortification upon learning of this disgraceful episode in her life. "I'm sure," she added, reproachfully, "you have trinkets enough without taking the only thing a poor girl had."

"Isn't your commiseration somewhat ill-timed, mamma, for the 'poor girl,' now that she is not here to reap the benefit of it?" sneered the dutiful young lady. "I don't care; it is an elegant trifle, anyhow, and I've half a mind to keep it, in spite of his lordship's demand," she added, defiantly, as she held up her hand, on which the ring gleamed, and regarded it covetously.

But she did return it, nevertheless; she did not quite dare to retain it, particularly as she could not relinquish all hope of winning the young lord even yet.

Mr. Richards, accompanied by Lord Carrol, proceeded with all possible dispatch to New York, and thence to Brooklyn, where they went directly to the seminary which Star attended, and inquired for her.

It was only half-past ten when they arrived there, but early as it was, Professor Roberts told them that she had come at the usual hour and severed her connection with the school, and very much to his regret, he added, as he considered her one of the most promising members of the senior class.

Both gentlemen looked blank on this information; they did not suppose Star would be so energetic to cover all traces of her flight.

She had asked, the professor said, for a recommendation, that she might more easily enter some other, as she hoped to be able to complete her course, although she did not tell him where she was going.

"And I did," he continued; "I gave her the very best one that could be put into words, for she deserved it."

Lord Carrol's eyes glowed at these praises of his darling; but Mr. Richards winced under them, for his conscience was smiting him keenly for ever having allowed Star to occupy so questionable a position in his family.

"You will oblige me if you will account for her absence in some casual way, if you are questioned about it," he said. "I should be sorry to have anything unpleasant said of her."

"Certainly; you may rely upon my being very discreet, for her sake," Professor Roberts returned, somewhat stiffly.

He bowed his visitors out, and then returned to his duties.

As for Mr. Richards and Lord Carrol, their way seemed suddenly hedged up; they did not know which way to turn next.

Still Lord Carrol was determined not to relinquish his search.

An advertisement was inserted in all the daily papers.

"Star, let me justify myself!" That was all; and Star, in her hiding place, read it many times with curling lips and scornful eyes.

"There can be no justification," she said; "one man bearing two names and deceiving two girls, can never be justified."

But her heart ached none the less, for, with shame she owned it, she loved him still. The days seemed endless, her duties arduous and monotonous; she grew thin, her step lost its elasticity, and she was as miserable as even Josephine, in her most malicious mood, could have wished.

November came, and with it the day of Archibald Sherbrooke's sailing for England.

No one ever returned to his native land with a sadder heart and deeper regret than the young Lord of Carrolton, and he would not have gone even then, but that some urgent business imperatively demanded it. He would have much preferred to remain and search for the fair girl whom he loved so devotedly.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE GOAL REACHED.

The winter passed, the summer came again, and on a sunny day in June the great chapel of the Normal College of New York City was packed with human beings to its utmost capacity.

Upon the broad platform were seated the professors, the tutors and guests, while the body of the vast hall was filled with its fifteen hundred students, attentive and vigilant like so many soldiers at their posts.

Among the large number of this class who occupy, on this occasion, the front seats in the chapel, there is one quiet figure, having a pale, delicate face, large, deep blue eyes, and a fair, gleaming brow, shaded by hair of brightest gold, which more than one of the numerous visitors have singled out from her sister graduates, on account of her peculiar loveliness and an indefinite something which seems to appeal to them from the depths of her lovely but rather sorrowful eyes.

Slight of form, unassuming in manner, but with a dainty, starlike beauty that was almost magnetic in its influence, she sat quietly in her seat until one of the professors announced the "Address in French," as per program, when she arose, and Miss Star Gladstone at once stepped upon the platform, saluting first the officers, teachers and guests, then her fellow students, with a charming little bow and a graceful inclination of her body.

A War on Film

On the film that ruins teeth

Dental science has declared a war on film. Millions of people, half the world over, have joined it. And leading dentists everywhere are securing new recruits.

This ten-day test will show you the results. Make it and note the change that comes in cleaner, prettier teeth.

Makes teeth dingy

Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. It makes white teeth look dingy. And most tooth troubles are now traced to that film.

Film is what discolors, not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Germs breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Many serious troubles are now traced to them.

Failed to end it

Old teeth cleaning methods have failed to end film. Much was left to night and day threaten serious damage. That's why well-brushed teeth discolored and decayed.

Dental science has for years sought ways to fight that film. Two effective methods have been found, and able authorities have well proved their efficiency.

Now those methods are combined in a dentifrice called Pepsodent—a tooth paste based on modern dental knowledge. And to millions of people it has brought a new era in teeth cleaning.

These five effects twice daily

Pepsodent combats the film in two effective ways. It leaves teeth highly polished, so film less easily adheres.

It also multiplies the salivary flow. That is Nature's great tooth-protecting agent. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits that cling. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is Nature's neutralizer of acids which cause decay.

Every application brings these five desired effects. All of them are deemed essential. But old methods never brought them.

Send the coupon for a 10-day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

In a week the results will surprise and delight you. And your home, we believe, will adopt this new method. Don't wait longer. Cut out the coupon now.

HABITUAL indigestion of babies is a serious condition and the parents and physician have reason to be alarmed, for although it is a simple functional disturbance of the stomach, it is apt to become chronic and you get a catarrhal inflammation of the mucous membranes, which is in itself serious, and it also lays the system open to other diseases, rendering it less fit to withstand them should they happen to occur. The symptoms of occasional indigestion are not likely to be mistaken for any other complaint. The suddenness of the attack, the vomiting and absence of symptoms indicating the invasion of any other disorder, the short duration of symptoms, and the rapid recovery. In older children it may not be quite so easy to tell, as often the invasion of some diseases, like scarlet fever, is ushered in by an attack of indigestion, vomiting, but of course if it is simply indigestion there is the absence of the fine characteristic rash. I wish to say right here as an aid to parents in taking care of babies, if baby vomits or has any symptom that is not normal, just stop and try and figure out if you can what might have caused it, and you will often get to the cause of the trouble. If it is a nursing baby, the mother must think of what she herself is eating, consider whether the baby has been nursed too fast, or that she is feeding her more often than its little stomach can digest.

People often say that they can never tell what ails the baby, as it cannot talk and tell you where it feels badly, but to me this is an advantage for it is a well-known fact that about half of what an adult tells you when sick does not help you at all in making a diagnosis, but is misleading. A baby at least does not do this, and a careful examination will enable you to discover the cause of its trouble. The treatment of simple indigestion of babies is simple, in fact the child may be entirely relieved by vomiting, nature's way of getting rid of what was causing the discomfort. If the baby continues pale and the vomiting continues after the stomach is emptied, you must do something to calm the irritability of this organ. This can be done most always with teaspoonful doses of lime-water and milk, every ten or fifteen minutes, made up as follows: milk, one-third; lime-water, two-thirds. If baby vomits this, try giving teaspoonful doses of lime-water and cinnamon-water every ten or fifteen minutes.

A small mustard plaster weakened with wheat flour, or Indian mush poultice may be applied over abdomen, these things usually relieve the vomiting. If they do not, try giving ten drops of paregoric. Continued fretting and crying would indicate that some of the disturbing food has gone down into the intestines, and if this is so you will find abdomen is swollen and hard. For this condition you should give teaspoonful doses of castor oil, or if the vomited matter indicates an acid condition, give one-fourth teaspoonful dose of magnesia. Treatment of habitual indigestion of babies or older children is very different from that required for the occasional or accidental form, for in case of the habitual form you have to meet something radically wrong, and have to regulate the diet, correct the constipation or the opposite relaxed condition causing diarrhea, and have to see that baby has the proper exercise and the proper exposure to air. Speaking of proper exposure to air, volumes are being written every day showing the beneficial results in the treatment of certain diseases out in the open air, even in the coldest weather in cold climates. We do not question but what these reports are correct, and wish to impress upon the minds of parents the wonderful good you can do your baby by keeping it out in the open air all that is possible.

We most certainly respect anything that successfully eliminates disease, especially when it is as free as pure, fresh air, but how much more important it is for your baby and my baby that we give them this fresh air as a preventive to these diseases. I know of a baby who has been sleeping out several hours a day, even in the coldest of the weather we have had this winter, the picture of health and has not had even the slightest sign of cold, when a neighboring family carefully keep their baby in an overheated room with the result of its having almost a continual head cold and irritating cough. We must not keep from our babies the fresh, pure air that they need so much in this wonderful stage of their development. In choosing food for a baby, bear in mind these two essential things—choose food they can digest, choose food that is nourishing and enables them to carry on their growth. If baby is constipated, give either the castor oil or magnesia often enough to relieve, if troubled with diarrhea, give them crushed, two or three times a day, a tablet containing bismuth subnitrate, three grains, pepsin sacch, two grains, aromatic chalk powder, one grain.

Questions and Answers

FONTANELLES, NEURASTHENIA, LEG SORES.—I am a young mother and writing for help. (a) Is my baby all right mentally, for in the back of his head there was a soft spot nearly an inch wide that is gradually closing? (b) Ever since my baby came, several months ago, there has been a buzzing noise around my heart, and when doing my work I hear my heart beat as if it were in my ears or head, then it goes so rapidly I can hardly count it. (c) Should I nurse my baby, four months old, as I have two sores on my leg that are spreading and painful?

MRS. E. B., Manassas, Va.

A.—The soft spot you mention in back of baby's head is the posterior fontanelle, which gradually closes within a few months after birth, and your baby will be all right mentally. (b) From your letter I think you have neurasthenia, a nervous disorder, and would suggest your taking valerianates of iron, quinine and zinc, one grain each every three hours; also take elixir of lactated pepsin in two teaspoonful doses after each meal, keep bowels regular and get out in the open air all that is possible. (c) Do not see how these sores on your leg can affect the baby's nursing, but think you ought to have them treated and healed up if they are painful.

INDIGESTION.—What can I do for my four-months-old baby, whose bowels will not move without medicine, and she vomits up her milk as soon as she stops nursing? MRS. M., Hampton, Ky.

A.—Your baby has indigestion, and the proper treatment for it is for you to get your own digestion and bowels regulated, then the baby's will be normal. Take five-grain doses of Ext. of Cascara Sagrada often enough to get one or two movements from your bowels a day; after meals take Elix. Lactated Pepsin, in two teaspoonful doses.

URIC ACID GRAVEL.—What will cure uric acid gravel in the urine, which I have had ever since baby came several months ago?

MRS. C. A. S., Toquerville, Utah.

A.—Take twenty-grain doses of Acetate of Potassium in water three times a day, also tablespoonful doses of lime-water in one-half glass of milk, three times a day, keep bowels regular with teaspoonful doses of Phosphate of Sodium, as often as needed.

BED-WETTING.—I have a boy seven years old who wets the bed every night and I have given him physician's medicine, also hear-say remedies, without results.

MRS. D. H. C., West Frankfort, Ill.

A.—Should have the urine examined, and if acid should give him ten-grain doses of Acetate of Potassium in water, three times a day, examine throat for diseased tonsils, nose for adenoids, and it may be that circumcision is indicated.

CONSTIPATION OF PREGNANCY.—Can you give me some advice, as I am two months pregnant and badly constipated? MRS. S. H. L., Luray, Va.

A.—Try to relieve constipation by diet, eating such foods as oatmeal porridge, bran bread, brown bread; eat fruit and drink glass of water first thing in the morning and the last thing at night; eat figs, dates and prunes. If diet does not relieve, take teaspoonful doses of compound licorice powder at night, or a seidlitz powder occasionally.

FEEDING BABY.—My four-months-old baby fusses all the time, seems discontented. I nurse him, also give him cow's milk and Dextri Maltose. He now weighs fourteen pounds, weighing six and three-fourths pounds at birth. He is badly constipated, for which I have tried castoria and prune juice.

MRS. W. F. B., Harmony, Pa.

A.—Your baby cries because it is not being properly fed. Wean him and put him on modified cow's milk, adding teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia, night and morning, if needed to relieve constipation.

DEFICIENT MILK FLOW; BLOTCHES ON FACE; NIGHT SWEATS.—I am an expectant mother and wish to know what to do to increase the amount of milk as I could not nurse my last baby. (b) Will you please print the prescription for blotches on face? (c) Will you tell me the cause and cure of night sweats?

MRS. C. A. M., Las Palomas, N. Mex.

A.—There is nothing you can do before the baby comes to increase the flow of milk, only to get your general health in the best possible condition; after the baby comes, drink lots of milk, broths, cocoa and other liquids, and eat vegetables, especially boiled beets without vinegar. (b) The prescription for blotches or brown spots on face was reprinted in the February COMFORT. (c) Night sweats may be caused by nervous exhaustion, but are most commonly caused by some general debility or disease, like tuberculosis. I cannot give a suggestion for treatment unless I know the cause in the special case.

ADENOIDS, DIET.—I am a young mother, twenty-two years old, and my baby girl, one month old, has a snuffling or rattling noise in her nose, although it does not hinder her from breathing and nursing. (b) What can I do to regulate my own bowels, and what foods should I eat to keep baby from having colic?

MRS. C. A., Atascadero, Calif.

A.—I should suspect a cold in the head with the mucous thrown off causing the rattling, but possibly there may be some slight obstruction, and if this continues should advise an examination by a physician who specializes on nose and throat. (b) Fluid Extract of Cascara Sagrada in one-half teaspoonful doses night and morning will relieve your constipation. Foods containing acids, such as apples, grapes, grapefruit and tomatoes, cause gas, especially if secretions are inclined to be very acid. I would suggest choosing foods that separate into small particles easily, for example, baked potato instead of boiled or fried, stale wheat bread toasted or dried out instead of fresh bread or rolls; crisp bacon is preferable to boiled or baked pork.

CONSTIPATED BABY.—My two-months-old son's bowels will not move unless I use a glycerine suppository, although I take a laxative every day. Should my sixteen-months-old daughter eat solid food? She eats practically nothing, but drinks cocoa.

MRS. R. V. K., Egeland, N. Dak.

A.—Take some laxative strong enough, night and morning, to move your bowels once or twice a day, and your nursing baby's bowels will become normal. A suppository, like an enema, is to be used as an emergency aid, not as a regular routine treatment. (b) Should give your sixteen-months-old daughter milk instead of cocoa, also some other foods, oatmeal gruel, custards, baked potato, stale wheat bread toasted, soft-boiled eggs, or any simple soup or broths not greasy.

I think this is a good place to exchange the ideas we think are the most helpful to us so I will tell you that I save many dollars every year by refooting stockings. I have a very simple pattern that I will send to those who send me a stamped, addressed envelope.

Before planting cucumber seeds, soak them in spirits of turpentine for twenty-four hours and the bugs will not bother them. If you are planting corn in new ground the same treatment will save the corn from cutworms.

There are many subjects up for discussion but I'm not going to write any more. I have no advice to give on the care of children. The older I get and the more of it I have to do, the more I realize I need all my own advice and all others can give.

I like to get letters so if any sisters care to write I will be glad to hear from you. I might be able to answer sometime but cannot promise to answer all.

Best wishes. MRS. GEORGE PETTIT.

Mrs. Pettit.—Yours is the first letter in thousands to disapprove of babies' pictures in COMFORT. All the others like them. I do not agree with you in that the movies are all bad and that they are responsible for all the evil in the world. However, you can think as you choose and I'll do the same and we'll remain the best of friends.—Ed.

COLLINS, MISS.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I hope this will be printed as I want my brother to see it for he says there are no such people as Mrs. Wilkinson and Uncle Lisha.

COMFORT has helped me while away lonely hours. I live in a small village where there aren't many young people and I get lonesome sometimes. I wish I could have some of my COMFORT friends to chat with during the long evenings, like tonight, for instance. We'd go into the kitchen and make some candy. Mrs. Wilkinson, I would be the happiest girl if only I could see you stick your head in my door sometime. I just know I would enjoy your company. It has been my ambition to be a writer or do work like yours and Uncle Charlie's to help people in need, but you know how far I am from that, for I am only a housekeeper and feel that I am not doing anything to help.

I am twenty-seven years of age, have brown hair, blue eyes, fair complexion. I would like to hear from the young people.

Love to all. MATTIE ROGERS.

Mattie.—Speaking of candy, here's a recipe that I like, though you may know all about it and doubtless can tell me lots about candy making. Two cups sugar, three-fourths cup of milk, four tablespoons peanut butter, few grains of salt and one teaspoon of vanilla. Put sugar and milk in sauce-pan, let cook until it forms a soft ball when dropped in cold water. Remove from fire and let cool considerably before adding salt, peanut butter and vanilla. Beat with spoon until creamy, turn into buttered tin—and you know the rest.—Ed.

CHANUTE, R. R. 4, KANS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Will you please admit a farmer's daughter? I enjoy the paper, but more especially the sisters' letters, the needlework page and the stories. I like to crochet and do quite a bit in my spare time.

I live with my parents, brothers and sisters on a farm of one hundred and fifty acres, which we recently bought, moving here from Wabaunsee County, Kansas, where we lived on one of the oldest farms known of for many, many miles, being settled in 1856, and which had the distinction of having the old Santa Fe train crose it. Buffalo Bill (Wm. F. Cody), now dead, carried mail, when a pony express rider, to it and deposited that belonging to neighboring people in an old log house, now standing, where he kept his relief horses. We enjoyed many good times there. We have lived here about a year but are not acquainted with many people, so spend my evenings at home reading. I'd like very much to get the book, "Judy of Rogue's Harbor," by Grace Miller White.

I would like to correspond with girls of my own age, twenty-five. I have golden brown hair, dark blue eyes, fair complexion and am five feet, seven inches tall and weigh about 130 pounds.

Sincerely, IRENE BEACH.

Irene.—What a paradise your farm must have been to your brothers and their boy friends. I just know they played "Buffalo Bill," and did they rescue you from the Indians?—Ed.

KAMPSVILLE, ILL.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

May I step in long enough to tell you how I make my linoleum?

My kitchen floor was wearing out and we couldn't afford to buy linoleum for it. I had an old rag carpet that was too old and worn to be of any use so I washed and dried it. Then I spread it out on a smooth surface and patched all the holes with thick pieces of cloth, pasted into place. I cooked a flour paste, thick, and smeared it all over the carpet, rubbing it in well. This I let dry, then I smeared another coat over it and when dried I gave it a coat of light grey paint and after that was dry, a second coat of paint. Before I laid it on the floor, I padded the floor with several thicknesses of newspaper. This is a good way to utilize your old rag rugs. I have a large one which I painted and use it by the kitchen stove. My kitchen didn't have any baseboards around the wall, so I cut oilcloth into strips and pasted these to the wall and painted them the same color as the woodwork.

I like house plants and have quite a number.

Undecided Mother, I think your husband is right.

With best wishes to all, MRS. IDA BECKER.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.

GOOD MORNING COMFORT SISTERS AND BROTHERS:

I've been a reader of this magazine for years and always thought I'd write you a letter sometime. I won't describe myself for I know you don't care about that. It isn't the color of the hair or eyes that makes the woman; but the use we make of the good common sense that God gave us, whether we are good or bad, kind or harsh, loving or cold. Let us turn the loving side of our nature outward so that the disagreeable side won't be discernable. Everyone loves beauty and harmony and despises deceit and an overabundance of self conceit.

Recently I had charge of a rummage sale which we held to raise money for an order of which I am a member. Our ladies donated the goods which were sold from an empty store building in the poorer part of the city. It made my heart ache to see how eager those poor people were to buy the things we did not need. Articles of clothing were donated that I thought would be impossible to get rid of but how anxious they were to obtain anything that cost only a few cents. Some of the things sold for more, of course. It made me think of the many things that are stored away in drawers and boxes that will never be used. Poor people all over the land would be glad to buy them at small cost rather than accept charity. I've been in the habit of giving away things but I never realized before how hard some may strive to pay their way as they go. Just the other day I read a letter in COMFORT from a woman who had put away her child's clothing and kept it for years, in memory of the dear face she will never see again. Sister, relinquish your hold on them and let some other little innocent have them that its life may be spared and thereby save a life and perhaps the soul of the poor mother who loves her little one just as much as you loved yours. In doing this you are helping someone and allowing them to help themselves.

EARL LA ROY BRACK.

Give? Do I ever expect to give to the needy again? Yes, indeed. I don't have much but I shall dispense as God giveth to me.

I am the mother of a little one buried and I never can forget the dear face although I haven't an article of clothing left to mourn over. Must I continually bring before others my grief? No, my object in life is to brighten this small corner where I am.

Love and best wishes to all the readers of COMFORT.

EVA.

ROZEL, KANS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been a subscriber of COMFORT only a short time but like it very much. I do all kinds of fancy work so enjoy the patterns that are given.

I have been married over two years and have a darling baby boy, eleven months old. I am sending his picture, taken when he was nine months old. I hope to see it in COMFORT. His name is Earl La Roy.

With my best to all, MRS. DANIEL BRACK.

KANSAS.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I am seeking advice but first I will tell you my story.

Five years ago I was keeping company with a nice looking, respectable young man, son of Christian people, who never let him see the inside of a picture show, go to a dance or associate with worldly people. In fact, he was the choice of the community. After keeping company for over a year we were married. He seemed to love me very much and his parents, being "well off," started us out in fairly good circumstances, but in about six months he grew tired of his occupation (farming) and fooled away everything his father had given him. He tried first this job, then that, but nothing suited. We moved from place to place, becoming worse off every move we made. I begged and talked to him, trying to get him to secure a good job and stick to it, for there was then plenty of work, and we could get along nicely, but all in vain. He accumulated debts which he never paid (and says he won't pay). I have worked and earned money to "help out" but the more I did the more he expected of me. God has blessed our home with two sweet, healthy children, which he loves and I try to show him that for their sake he should set a different example, but he says he doesn't care and as his parents have now refused to help him any more, he is getting his living dishonestly. What an example for his children and this is what worries me night and day. What if these children grow up and follow in his footsteps? If I should take them to myself, work and bring them up, afterwards when they knew, would they respect and love their mother in return for leaving their father? Or, if I keep on living with him and he does some awful deed that brings disgrace upon the name, will they grow up to hate me? I have given him every chance to reform, for I have left him three times and each time he has promised so much I have gone back. He no longer seems to love me and doesn't appreciate anything I do for him, yet is very affectionate toward the children. People are beginning to be suspicious and every day he is heaping more worry upon me.

I am a dressmaker by trade, and can make suits, coats, dresses, men's shirts, everything in the sewing line and if I were to take my two little ones I could keep them with me and make a living for them and make their childhood days happy. Sisters, advise me. What is best for me to do? He allows me no privileges, am not allowed to go anywhere or spend the money I earn without telling him how I spend every cent and if he does not approve of what I buy he never gets through scolding about it.

Please tell me what you would do if you were in my place? You may obtain my address from Mrs. Wilkinson.

May God bless you all.

BROKEN-HEARTED MOTHER.

Montgomery Ward & Co.

The Oldest Mail Order House is to-day the most progressive —

1872

THE first little one-page mail order leaflets were sent out by Montgomery Ward & Co. in 1872. The first catalogue, pictured above, was issued in 1874. It contained eight pages, about three by five inches in size. This was the beginning of the mail order business—of selling goods direct by mail at one small profit.

1922

FIFTY years of fair dealing, of prices that always offered a saving, and today this big Golden Jubilee Catalogue contains everything for the Home, the Farm and the Family—everything at money-saving prices.

50th Anniversary

This big Golden Jubilee Catalogue pictured above is priced to match the spirit of the times. Some things are priced at no profit, many things at very little profit. It is your best guide to the lowest prices.

THIS is the Golden Anniversary of Montgomery Ward & Co. We have completed Fifty Years in the service of the American Public.

In 1872 this business was begun in one small room, twelve by fourteen feet.

Today, millions buy from us on faith in the name: "Montgomery Ward." Upon what is that faith founded?

Upon Fifty Years of fair dealing, upon Fifty Years devoted to selling only goods of standard quality at the lowest possible prices.

This 50th Anniversary Catalogue keeps faith with our customers. It is priced to meet present-day conditions. It is filled with new, fresh merchandise with every price based upon the new low costs of production.

Some things at No Profit Many things at Little Profit

At Montgomery Ward & Co. we believe we owe a duty to our customers—that it is our duty to sell everything today at the lowest possible prices.

We believe we owe a duty to the American Farmer. Therefore, we are selling all our Tillage Tools absolutely without profit to us.

Many of these tools are actually priced at less than it would cost us to replace them today. This is the way we are keeping faith with the American Farmer.

And to the American Woman we are offering almost equal advantages—New York Fashions, selected in New York by Ward's own Fashion Experts.

All are offered at the lowest prices possible today.

Everything needed in the home—everything to make the home more attractive—everything priced at a big saving for you.

The New-Old Spirit of Montgomery Ward & Co.

We are entering our second half century of business existence. And we step forward with the spirit of youth, of progress in Service and Saving for you.

Old-Fashioned Smocking

Handsome all-over pattern and border for quilts which can be made of small bits of contrasting colors. Submitted by Mrs. J. W. Dowling, Ga.

The Useful Art of Smocking

AS in our childhood days smocking is again the style. It is used plentifully on children's little dresses and rompers and on waists and blouses for grown-ups.

Nothing is daintier for the little tots than simple garments with a touch of this old-fashioned stitchery. All garments which are to be trimmed in this way should be of material, whether of cotton or silk, which is very soft and naturally folds prettily such as voile or crepe de chine.

Kimonos of cotton crepe or house dresses finished with a little smocking are most attractive and also serviceable. But as fancy work or the actual way to do smocking is our subject rather than dressmaking, we will proceed at once to the manner of starting to do this work and the various stitches which are employed.

As with every kind of fancy work, evenness and perfection are the first requisites.

To secure this in smocking it is most necessary to have some means of keeping the lines of gathering threads absolutely straight. One should also have plenty of material in width, as smocking will allow of no skimping.

For this reason it is best to do this work first and afterwards cut out the garment.

To give the smocking the proper elasticity it is also necessary to take the stitches sufficiently deep into each fold, so that when the gathering threads are taken out, one will get the honeycomb appearance characteristic of good work.

A beginner will find cotton voile a very good material to try her hand on, it is much easier to work than silk, and, when gathered, it sets in even ridges, which are easily worked over. With this, some crewel needles and some mercerized colored cottons one is ready to commence work.

First of all the gathering has to be prepared. This must not be too fine or too coarse—five stitches to the inch would be about right. Gather the whole width of the space to be smocked.

The second row of the gathering should be about half an inch below the first; be careful to take each stitch exactly under those of the first row, as shown in Fig. 1. One will see the necessity of this when the threads are drawn up tight, as the material must run in straight little ridges on which the fancy stitches are worked.

Continue the rows of gathering, still keeping the stitches exactly under each other, until one has done the depth that is to be worked; then draw the threads up tight as shown in Fig. 2 and fasten them securely.

If one has not a very straight eye and feels the need of a guide to keep those gathering stitches straight, one may be made in this way. Put a coarse needle in the sewing machine, take a piece of white paper about the weight of ordinary stationery or writing paper.

Rule a line from top to bottom about an inch in from the edge. Run over this with the unthreaded needle making a line of holes. Leave about a quarter inch space and using the machine foot for a guide stitch again, repeat until a good-sized sheet of paper is covered in this way.

Next take a large darning needle and run through a hole in the first row. Count five or more holes and run through the next according to the space one wishes to have between the rows.

Make these holes just opposite each other in each row.

Repeat this punching over the width of the paper, when one will be ready to begin work.

Lay this pattern upon the material, first pulling and pinning it out so that it will be perfectly straight and smooth. With a pencil make a dot on the goods through every large hole.

If the material is dark mark with a needle and white thread, afterwards cutting between the holes.

The pattern can be lifted and replaced till the entire space to be worked is dotted, but care must be taken to always place the pattern evenly and also to prevent the pattern from slipping when marking.

It is best to do both the marking and gathering on the wrong side, so that the right side of the material will be fresh when the garment is finished.

To Gather

Thread a needle with cotton No. 30 or 40 according to quality of the goods, and commence gathering by inserting the needle in the top right-hand dot and bring the point out half way between this and the next dot in the same line, then in through the second dot and up half way between this and the third and so on to the end of the line or space to be gathered.

Gather each row of dots in the same manner, stitch under stitch as shown in Fig. 1.

When this is completed, draw up the threads, keeping the gathers in place by twisting the end of the thread around pins. Pull the work now until the gathers are arranged and lie perfectly flat and even, as shown in Fig. 2.

The Stitches Used in Smocking

Outlining is one of the simplest stitches used in smocking. This is especially good for working a straight row of stitches. It is done in the usual way.

Commence work at the top left-hand corner of the gathers, and bring the needle out in the first plait; take a stitch on next plait, keeping the thread on the left side of the needle, and do not pull up too tight.

The plaits must be taken up separately, one stitch into each, taking care to keep a perfectly straight line.

Another very good stitch for working a straight line is illustrated in Fig. 2.

To do this take a stitch through each plait in a straight line as in outlining but change the thread from side to side. Take the first stitch through first two plaits and be careful to keep thread on the left side of the needle; take a stitch on the third plait, in line with last stitch, but with the thread on the right side of the needle.

Work on like this, with the thread alternately on the left and then the right side of the needle to the end of the row.

Two rows of this stitch form a sort of cable stitch. To do this, work the first row as just described; for the second one, commence on the first plait as directed quite close up to the first row, then take up the second plait, but where thread was kept on the left side of the needle before, in the last row, in this second row keep it on the right side and vice versa.

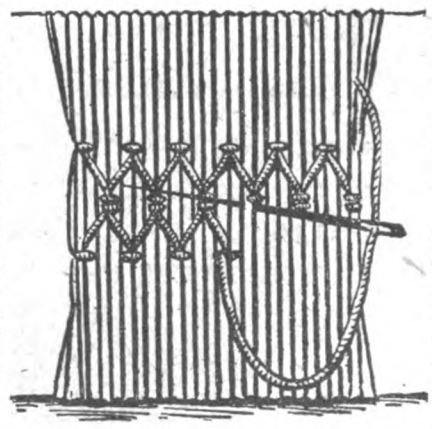

FIG. 4.

Honeycomb Stitch

Now we come to the most popular and of the prettiest of the fancy stitches used in smocking. This is the Honeycomb pattern illustrated in Fig. 3.

Commence work in the upper left-hand corner by bringing needle out toward the left, taking a stitch through the first plait, take up the second in a line with this, keeping the thread on the left side of the needle.

Take a stitch on the third plait a quarter of an inch below, as shown in the sketch, still keeping the thread on the left side.

Work on the fourth plait on a line with the last stitch, but with the thread on the right side of the needle; work on the fifth plait a quarter of an inch above or on a line with the first stitch, keeping the thread on the right side. Repeat this to the end of the row.

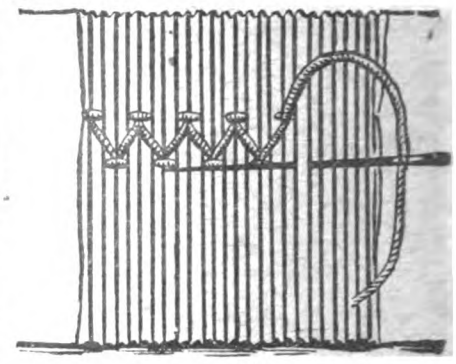

FIG. 3.

4th row—Once across of outline.
5th row—Honeycomb.
Two more rows of outlining.

A SMOCKED VOILE WAIST.

A Smocked Voile Waist

This is the stitch used in the white voile waist here illustrated. Two bands of four rows each of honeycomb stitch in black boil proof mercerized cotton are used on the front and also on the bottom of the sleeves.

In the space between the smocking on the waist are groups of roll-stitch or French knot embroidery—delicate pinks, blues and lavenders being used with yellow for centers and a bit of green. These little groups of charming color combination also appear on the cuffs and collar, the edges of which are finished with one row of black crocheting. To do this make 1 single, ch 3, 1 single into the edge of the cloth about one quarter inch from the first stitch.

Fig. 4 shows clearly the manner of working two honeycombing. To do this, work the first row as directed, and the second row as follows: Bring up your needle in the first plait, half an inch lower than where the first row was commenced. Take up the second plait on a straight line, and have the thread on the right side of the needle; the third plait is taken up a quarter of an inch higher, as shown in Fig. 4, it ought to meet the lower stitch in the last row, and the thread should be on the right side of the needle.

The fourth plait is taken up in a straight line with this last, but with the thread on the left-hand side.

The fifth is taken a quarter of an inch lower again, with the thread still on the left-hand side, and so on to the end.

Combination Stitches

In smocking combinations of stitches, as well as colors, are used in groups very effectively.

After a little practice of the different stitches this can be done very easily.

One of the simplest combinations is that of outline and honeycomb stitch. (See top of Fig. 5).

Suggestions for Combinations of Colors in Stitches

Suggestion No. 1.—Of two colors and black, commence as directed for Fig. 2 with the lighter shade, then one row of outlining in black, next one row honeycomb in darker shade, one row outlining in black. Now repeat, making alternate rows of honeycomb of the two shades with black outlining between for the desired depth, then finish to match the beginning.

This is a very pretty combination for children's simple little dresses.

Suggestion No. 2.—First two rows of outline stitch, worked as closely as possible together.

In above use black for the outline rows. Dark old blue for the first row of honeycomb and a lighter shade for second row.

Next, a quarter of an inch apart, work three rows of feather stitching. The first of light blue, second of gold and third of light blue, then finish with a band of outline and honeycomb stitches, using the second and then the darkest shade of blue. This combination is very pretty on either blue or white goods.

Suggestion No. 3.—This is a pretty combination of stitches which can be used if one wishes to do a piece of work all in one color.

First three rows of outlining, one row of feather stitching, three more rows of outlining. About a quarter-inch space should be left on either side of the feather stitching.

Next work four rows of stitches as follows: Commencing on the first plait take up one stitch close to the last row. Take up the second plait in a line with this, with the thread on the left side of the needle. Take up the third plait a little lower, thread still to the left. Take up the fourth and fifth plaits, each a little lower than the last, with the thread to the left.

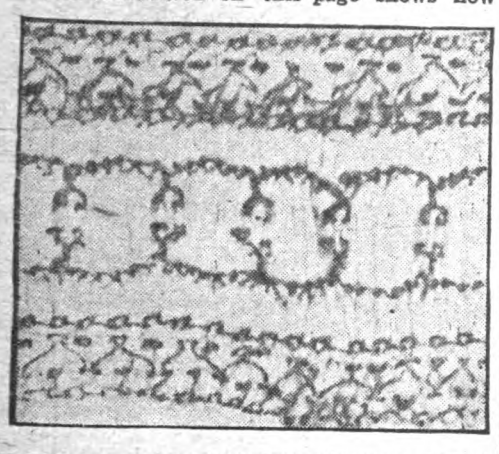
The sixth, take in line with the last but with the thread to the right of the needle.

The seventh, eighth and ninth are each a little higher than the last, and with the thread on the right side.

The tenth is taken up even with the last and with the thread on the left. Working in this way one makes a wavy line of stitches which touches the outline stitches at regular intervals. Make the next row in the same way touching the preceding row as it waves across.

Work two more rows following with a band



Sunshine and Shadow Submitted by Mrs. Blanche I. Owensby, Okla.

Shown in Easy Stitches

of outline and feather stitch to match the beginning.

Wavy lines can also be worked across running parallel with each other.

Our illustration on this page shows how charming a bit of smocking makes the simple comfortable little frock for either a tiny girl or boy.

This little model, which is of white dimity, has the sleeves and the top of the pocket smocked with a band of honeycomb stitch between two rows of outlining all in yellow.

The fronts have a deeper band of a combination of stitches, which one should not find difficult after a little practice on the simpler stitches which have been described.

The first band consists of honeycomb between cable stitches (Fig. 6), then two rows of a fancy stitch which forms two broken or half circles, as shown.

Commence work a little over half an inch lower than the last row. Take up the second plait in a line with the first, keeping the thread to the right.

Take up the third and fourth a little higher each than the last. The fifth on a line with the last.

Then three each a trifle lower, the fourth on a line with the last. Now to take the two stitches which appear in the center of this pattern, run the needle back to the first of the last stitch, then the point in the opposite direction and on the plait previous to that over which the last stitch is worked, take one stitch a quarter of an inch lower than the last stitch.

Put the needle in again just where you brought it out for the last stitch and then take another stitch on a line with the last one. This makes the two center stitches.

After this row is complete, repeat, but work from the opposite end or turn your piece of work just upside down, then these two rows will come together just reversed, as shown in the detail of the pattern above.

Pillow Slip Insertion and Edging Lace

Insertion

Begin with ch 7 for center of wheel, join in ring, into this work 3 d c, ch 10 sts, * form last 3 into ring with sl st, ch 6, form 3 sts into picot, 1 d c in small or end of ch, ch 5, 1 p, 1 d c in same ring, repeat, making 5 picots in all, 7 s c on ch 7, 3 d c in 1st ring, ch 10, repeat from *, joining 1st picot of 2nd spoke to last picot of 1st. Then in joining the wheels together, as one works, join center picot of two side spokes.

The Wool Flower Fad

If it has a touch of wool it is smart this season, whether it be a dress, hat, bag or something purely for household use, for wool embroidery and little crocheted flowers are used to add a dash of color to almost everything for feminine use.

And for once the fad of the moment is something which almost any woman is equal to, for the work is most simple, charming effects being obtained from the collection of stray odds and ends of wool, which are to be found in practically every household after the past few years of strenuous knitting.

Wool Hat Trimmings

The little ornaments suggested will be sure to delight any school girl, as they are worn on everything from tams to dressy velvets. Roses made in the same way as Irish crocheted roses with a few green leaves look well on almost anything in the hat line or a group of little balls, each of a different color and stuffed with cotton give a pretty effect.

For a fruit cluster make single crochet circles an inch in diameter, then narrow in, fill each with cotton and afterwards tack the front in closely, in or near the center, with a couple of French knots. Use different bright colors and add a few green leaves made of 9 loose d c sts on either side of a ch, with 5 d c in the center st.

A Hat Band

A handsome embroidery ribbon band may be made of a yard and a third of six-inch soft satin ribbon. Either black, navy or brown is good as a dark color is needed to show off the work.

In the center of the ribbon work a flat rose. This is done by twisting together strands enough to equal one's little finger.

Two shades will be needed, using the darker one for the center. Wind the strands about a couple of fingers three times, slip off, flatten out and couch in place with wool of the same color.

Next with the lighter shade, carry as many strands about this center once, catch in place, then work back and forth surrounding only about two thirds of the center and finish by twisting the strands and carrying once around completely.

To the very center add a few yellow French knots which should be half hidden.

On the left side of the rose work a bunch of grapes in over-and-over stitch and a couple of leaves and curling tendrals in outline stitch.

Finish this side with some yellow wheat in lazy-daisy stitch and green leaves.

On the right of the roses work a daisy, and below, trailing off a few forget-me-nots, made of different shades of French knots about a yellow center and green leayes and stems.

Fluted Diamond Lace

Begin this four-inch edging with ch 56 sts, turn.

1st row—1 d c in 9th st from hook, 2 d c in next 3 sts, ch 5, sk 5, 29 s c in 28 sts, ch 5, sk 5, 2 d c, ch 2, sk 2, 2 d c, ch 3, turn.

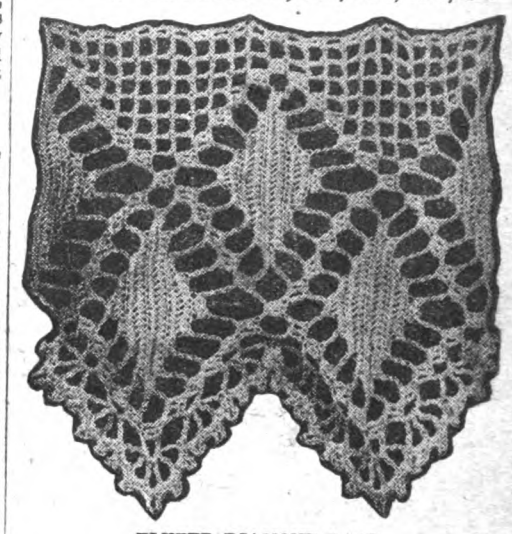
2nd row—1 d c on 2nd d c in last row, 2 sps, 3 d c under ch 5, sk 3 s c, 22 s c, working only through nearest loop of st, ch 5, 3d c under ch 5, ch 5, 3 d c under end ch, ch 10, turn.

3rd row—1 d c in each of 2 1st sts of ch and 1 d c on d c of group 3 doubles, ch 5, 4 s c under ch 5, ch 5, 3 d c under ch 5, ch 5, sk 3 s c, 16 s c, working through 1 loop only, ch 5, 3 d c under 3 sps, 2 d c, ch 3, turn.

4th row—1 d c, 4 sps, 3 d c, ch 5, sk 3 s c, 10 s c, ch 5, 3 d c, ch 5, 3 s c under ch 5, 4 s c on s c, 3 s c under ch 5, ch 5, 3 d c under end ch, ch 10, turn.

5th row—Work same as in beginning of 3rd row, ch 5, 3 s c under ch, s c on s c, 3 s c, under ch, ch 5, 3 d c, ch 5, 4 s c, ch 5, 3 d c, 5 sps, 2 d c, ch 3, turn.

6th row—1 d c, 6 sps, 3 d c, ch 3, 3 d c, ch 5, 3 s c under ch, s c on s c, 3 s c under ch, ch 5, 3 d c, ch 10, turn.



7th row—Same as 5th row in turning, then ch 5, 3 s c under ch, s c on s c, 3 s c under ch, ch 5, 3 d c under ch 3, 7 sps, 2 d c, ch 3, turn.

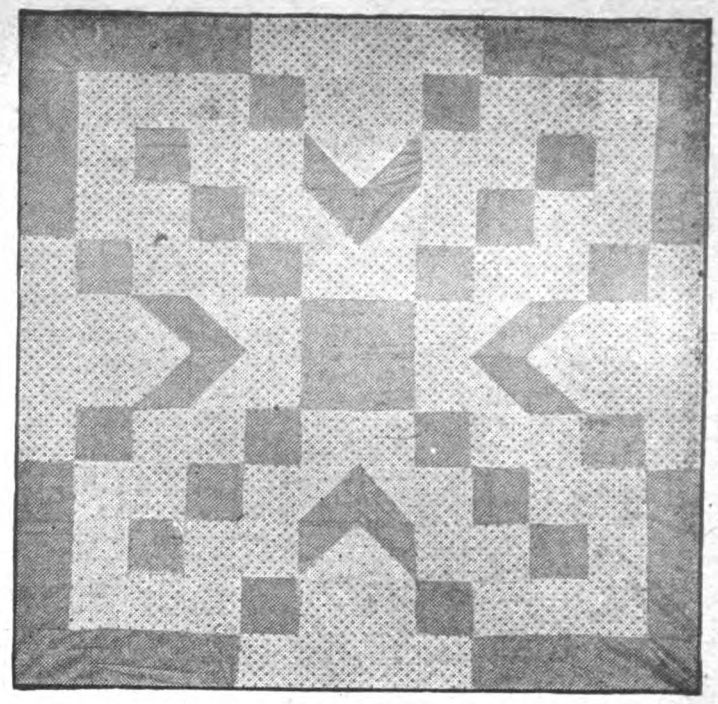
8th row—1 d c, 6 sps, 3 d c, ch 5, sk 3 s c, 1 s c on each to within 3 singles of the end, ch 5, 3 d c, ch 3, turn.

9th row—3 d c under ch (one is now decreasing the point), sk 3 s c, work 1 s c on each to within 3 s c of end, ch 5, 3 d c, ch 5, 4 s c, ch 5, 3 d c, 5 sps, 2 d c, ch 3, turn.

10th row—1 d c, 4 sps, 3 d c, ch 5, 3 s c under ch, 4 s c on s c, 3 s c under ch, ch 5, 3 d c, ch 5, singles on singles omitting first and last 3, ch 5, 3 d c, ch 3, turn.

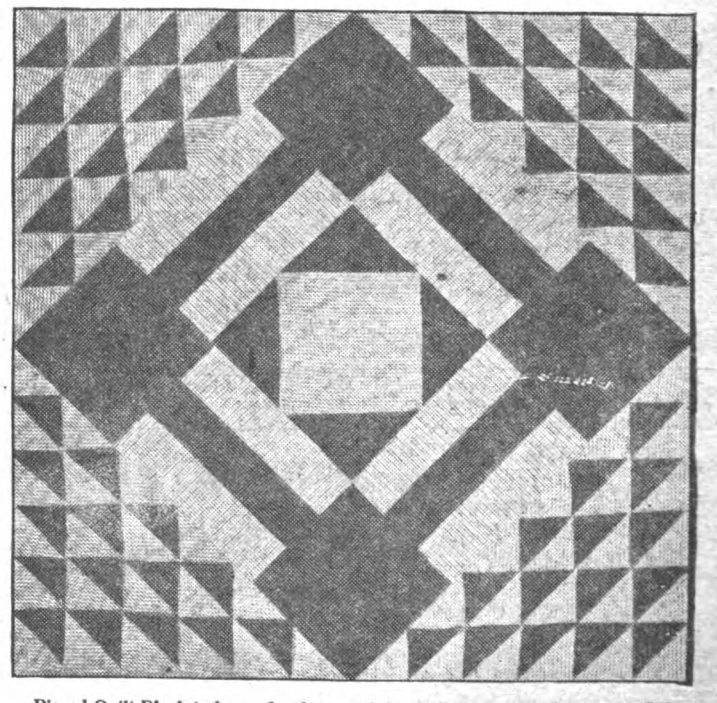
11th row—3 d c under ch, ch 5, 4 s c, ch 5, 3 d c, ch 5, singles increasing by 3 at each end, ch 5, 3 d c, 3 sps, 2 d c, ch 3, turn.

FLUTED DIAMOND LACE.



12th row—1 d c, 2 sps, 3 d c, ch 5, singles, ch 5, 3 d c, ch 3, 3 d c, ch 7, turn.

13th row—3 d c under ch 3 between doubles, ch 5, singles, ch 5, 3 d c, 1 sp, 2 d c, ch 3, turn.



One point is now complete. After length is finished add fan edge. Begin by fastening thread in the end of 1st row on pointed edge, 1 tr c in sp in end 3rd row, ch 2, 1 tr c in same sp, repeat, making 4 trs, in all. Make treble fan in sp in end of 5th, 7th, 9th, 11th rows, 3 s c in sp in end 13th row, repeat fans around each point.

2nd row—Begin at same point and in each sp between trebles work 2 s c, ch 3 for p, 2 s c, repeat around points.

This pattern made up of No. 30 ecru crochet cotton and increased to about twice the width shown above, simply by adding to the spaces at the top, is especially suitable for the ends of natural linen scarfs or chair-backs.

Stella Rosevelt

In clear, bell-like tones she began her address, without the slightest appearance of self-consciousness or embarrassment, rolling out sentence after sentence in the smoothest and purest of French, until those who were well versed in the language wondered at such proficiency in one so young, while those who could not understand it were spellbound by her exquisite voice and graceful gestures.

Star had been well taught in French before coming to this country, until it had become almost like her native tongue; therefore, after a year of arduous study under the best of teachers at the Normal College, it is not strange that she should have been chosen, on account of her purity of accent, to deliver the French oration.

"Who is she?" questioned one of the visitors of a teacher.

"Miss Gladstone," she answered, pointing to the name on the program.

"How lovely she is! and I never heard purer French spoken, even in Paris. Does she live in the city?"

"I believe so, although I do not know where. She comes and goes very quietly, and her clothing indicates that her friends, whoever they may be, are in limited circumstances. She appears to have no intimates, and yet she is a favorite with all. There must be some sorrowful story connected with her life, I think, for there is a haunting sadness in her eyes whenever they meet yours, except when she smiles or becomes animated in conversation; then she is charming."

"I should like to know her," said the first speaker, musingly.

The subject of the above conversation, although unconscious of it, was none the less worthy of it.

After leaving Jacob Rosevelt on the night of her exciting interview with Mrs. Richards, she sped swiftly back to her room, where she gathered together a few articles of clothing and packed them into a small valise; her school books also, with her portfolio and the small box which had so aroused Josephine's curiosity that day when she went to steal Star's lovely cameo.

These preparations ended, she retired to rest.

She awoke long before daylight, and dressing herself in a dark street dress, she sat down by the window to wait for the dawn.

She penned that little note to Mrs. Blunt the last thing before leaving the house. The woman had been so kind to her that she could not find it in her heart to go away without a single word of farewell; to the others she gave not a thought.

As soon as it was light enough, she stole softly downstairs and out at the front door, as it was nearer, and, besides, some of the servants might be up if she went out the back way, and turned her back forever upon the house in which she had only been "tolerated."

When she reached the lodge, she found Mr. Rosevelt waiting for her on the vine-covered porch.

He smiled a silent good morning, motioning her not to speak, with a gesture that told her that John Mellin's wife was not far off; and together they went out from the grounds by a side gate and proceeded toward the station.

They were in time for the early morning train, and reached New York long before the household which they had left behind were aware of their flight.

"We will go to some quiet street and board for a few days," Mr. Rosevelt said, as they sat down in the waiting-room of the station to consult upon what was best to be done. "You must not lose a day of school if you can help it. I know just the place for us, I think, where there is a good, motherly soul of a landlady."

Star assented to this plan, and they repaired to the boarding place which Mr. Rosevelt had mentioned.

After partaking of a simple but wholesome breakfast, Star went at once to Brooklyn, and had an interview with Professor Roberts, as we already know.

On her way back to New York she decided, if she could pass the examination, she would enter the Normal College, believing that among the multitude who attended there she would escape observation more easily than in a similar school.

She went immediately and had an interview with the president, after which she was admitted to the senior class, "upon conditions."

She gave up all thoughts of music for the present, and bent all her energies to her studies, and soon not one of the forty who were to graduate gave promise of a more brilliant ending to her career as a scholar.

Meantime, Mr. Rosevelt had found three furnished rooms in a cheap but respectable locality, where they took up their abode, the woman who owned and lived in the house, agreeing to furnish their meals and act as sort of housekeeper general for a reasonable amount.

Mr. Rosevelt would not hear a word to any other arrangement, although Star declared she could do a portion of the work herself.

"No; you shall do nothing of the kind. You will have all you can attend to to keep up with your classes," he said.

"But it will cost so much, Uncle Jacob," Star answered, ruefully, for she found that her poor hundred pounds was melting rapidly away—at least, it would do so if they paid for having all their work done. Mr. Rosevelt smiled.

"My dear," he said, though somewhat sadly, she thought, "you did not suppose I was going to allow you to assume the burden of my whole support, did you? I never should have consented to come away with you in that case. I am not quite penniless, and what I can afford to pay toward our support will at least relieve you of all necessity of laboring as a household drudge."

They were as cozy as they could well be with their simple yet homelike little parlor, and two bedrooms leading out of it, and with their meals served to them there, it was very much like a home of their own.

"It is just as nice as can be, and I am happy as a queen," Star declared, over and over again; but he often looked troubled when he saw how thin her cheeks were growing, noticed her oft-repeated but quickly suppressed sighs, and that "haunting sadness" in her eyes.

Once during the year, when speaking of what she should do as soon as she graduated, she said that she had decided to apply for a situation as teacher in the city; she had concluded to remain in America instead of returning to England as she had at first planned to do.

He did not ask her why; he understood what she meant; she wished the sea to roll between her and the man who had so ruined her life; and perhaps, he thought, with a very tender feeling in his heart, she wanted to stay with him.

Thus the year sped around, and brought with its revolution another commencement day for Star.

Thus she had persevered and overcome every obstacle until the goal was reached, and today she would receive her diploma.

Uncle Jacob had gone to the great chapel with other interested friends, and watched the dear girl with glistening eyes while she so creditably performed the part assigned to her, feeling that she was an honor to her class, and in his eyes, at least, the gem of them all.

That evening there was to be a grand reunion in a commodious hall near by, where graduates of previous years were to meet the senior class of today, to offer their congratulations on their success and their good wishes for their future career.

Star had no fine clothes in which to make a show of herself, and was obliged to go clad in the same simple lace bunting that she had worn during the day; but she gave herself an air of elegance by substituting some bright flowers for the knots of blue ribbon, and excitement lending a rich color to her cheeks and light to her eyes, no one thought of criticizing her garments.

Jacob Rosevelt, too, dressed in a full new suit of handsome broadcloth, with a satin necktie and light kid gloves, did not look much like the bent, shabby old man who had arrived, dusty and travel stained, at Mr. Richards' mansion a little less than a year ago.

"Where did you get it?" Uncle Jacob?" Star exclaimed, as he came forth from his chamber and asked her if she thought he'd do.

He smiled mysteriously, then said:

"I told you that I was not quite a beggar, dear, when I left my niece Ellen's inhospitable roof, and so I've been saving up for this occasion, in order that I might do honor to you."

"You are just as fine as you can be," Star said, delightedly, as she went around and around him to examine the material and fashion of his new garments, "and I do not believe any one will be more proud of her escort tonight than I shall be; and yet," she thought, "Uncle Jacob must have been very saving indeed to have been able to buy such an expensive suit."

His eyes glowed with pleasure at her words; but when they entered the brilliantly lighted hall, and he saw the elegant toilets of some of the young ladies, he could not help regarding her with something of regret, although very many admiring eyes were fixed upon the arm of the stately, gray-haired gentleman, as they went forward to pay their respects to President Hunter and his corps of assistants.

"Miss Gladstone, I have a friend who desires to be presented to you," said one of Star's teachers, seeking her out later in the evening.

She led her toward a lady who was sitting a little apart from them, and who appeared to be three or four years Star's senior, and introduced her as Miss Meredith.

It was the visitor who had inquired so particularly regarding our heroine during the graduating exercises.

She was drawn toward her at once, and they were soon chatting as sociably as if they had been acquaintances of long standing.

While thus engaged, a gentleman approached them, greeting both young ladies in the most cordial manner.

"I was hoping that you two would meet tonight," he said, bestowing a smiling face upon them both. "Miss Meredith is a graduate of two years ago, Miss Gladstone, and I am sure you will find her a congenial spirit."

"Thank you, Mr. Appleton," Miss Meredith responded, brightly; "but you should have put it the other way, for I have been very impatient to meet Miss Gladstone. I singled her out from her class today, and felt sure that we should be en rapport, as the spiritualists say, if we could only become acquainted.

"Well, I think it does not matter much which way you put it, now that you know each other," the gentleman returned, smiling; then turning to Star, he added:

"So, my young friend, you have really 'run the race, and finished the course'; and now do you remember the promise you made me several months ago?"

Star flushed vividly at this question.

"Did I make you a promise, Mr. Appleton?" she asked, evasively, adding, with an arch glance: "I thought it was you who made me a promise."

He laughed and shook his finger at her.

"You said that on your eighteenth birthday I might reveal a secret."

"And you promised you would not reveal it until I was eighteen," she retorted, brightly, although the color deepened in her cheeks as she continued: "I am not eighteen yet, Mr. Appleton."

"No, but you will be tomorrow. You see I have not forgotten the date. Now, let me take time by the forelock a little, and whisper to Miss Meredith who the author of 'Chatsworth Pride' is. She has been on the qui vive to know her ever since the book was published," Mr. Appleton said, bending a roguish look upon Star, who now stood with drooping eyes and appearing somewhat confused.

"Oh, do you know? Is it some friend of yours, Miss Gladstone?" Miss Meredith said, eagerly, to her. "I think it is so tantalizing not to know the name of the author of a book," she went on, "particularly if it is one you happen to like very much; and here this provoking man who published this one only put on a great star where he should have printed the author's name. Do tell me, please, Miss Gladstone; I am, indeed, all curiosity."

Then remarking Star's embarrassment, she looked from her to Mr. Appleton, questioningly.

"Is it?" she went on, excitedly, as he smiled and glanced at the fair girl. "Can it be possible that it is Miss Gladstone herself? I believe it is," she said, with sparkling eyes, as she seized Star's hands; "and, oh! what can I say to you? It is a charming little book, and I have enjoyed it more than I can tell you. There! let me shake the hand that wrote it, and if I had a laurel wreath here I would put it on this golden head and make you wear it the remainder of the evening."

And she squeezed and shook that small, white-gloved hand until Star laughingly begged for mercy.

"See what you have subjected me to," she said, with a half-reproachful look at Mr. Appleton.

"You might just as well make the best of it, my modest little friend," that gentleman replied, laughing. "I have kept silence for a year under the most trying circumstances, for I have been unmercifully besieged to tell who the author of 'Chatsworth's Pride' is, and I could not stand the fire any longer. My time is too valuable to be spent in any such way; and I came here tonight not only to congratulate you upon your graduation, but also to introduce my fair young author to my friends. Yes, Miss Meredith, Miss Stella Gladstone is the author of 'Chatsworth's Pride.'"

"Miss Stella Gladstone?" Miss Meredith repeated.

"Yes; and, you perceive, I was not far from giving the name, after all. I was obliged to 'make her mark,' since I could not write her name," returned Mr. Appleton, jocosely.

"Ah, yes, I see. Stella means a star; and certainly," Miss Meredith said, turning to her new acquaintance again, "you bid fair to shine like one."

Not to Be Beaten

An Alabama darky, who prided himself on being able to play any tune on the banjo after he had heard it once, perched himself on the side of a hill one Sunday morning and began to pick the strings in a workmanlike manner.

It chanced that the minister came along. Going up to Moses, he demanded harshly: "Moses, do you know the Ten Commandments?"

Moses scratched his chin for a moment, and then, in an equally harsh voice, said:

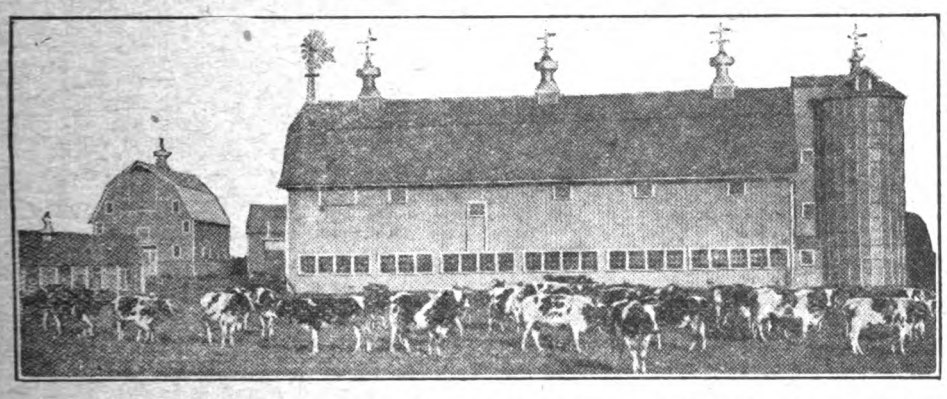
Farm Improvement

Written for COMFORT

"THE poor workman blames his tools," but excuses do not pay the taxes or lift the mortgage. Good workman and good tools go together.



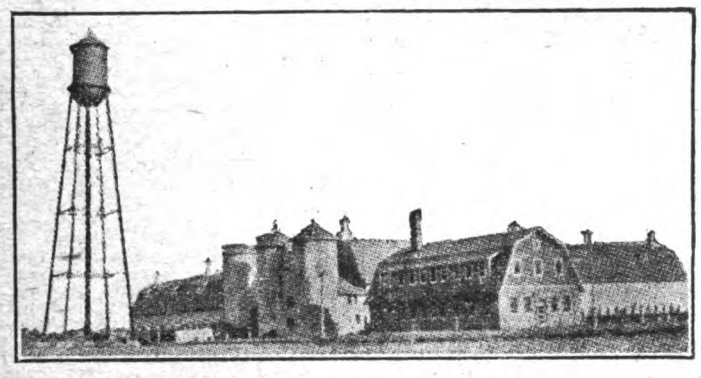
Agricultural advancement can be measured by the rate or improvement in farm machinery and the introduction of labor-saving implements to take the place of slow and tedious hand labor. More than ever before the farmer of today is taking advantage of the newer and more efficient farm machinery that is ever being perfected to meet his changing and growing needs. There was a time when machinery was considered somewhat in the light of a luxury—something that could be got along without, and that really had a place only on the elaborate estates of the very wealthy. Not so today. Times have changed, indeed. Several new influences have made themselves felt on the farm. Labor has been scarce and expensive; money has been none too plentiful for hiring extra farm help; therefore we find that an increasing number of farmers are trying to do more of their own work themselves, are so planning their crops and their buildings that this can be accomplished—with the use of modern machinery as a necessary means to the end of getting the work done in less time and at a saving in man power.

Furthermore, new standards of living have made their way into the country as well as the city; old-fashioned dwellings, implements, barns and methods have everywhere given way to up-to-date ones. Farmers now want more comforts and conveniences in homes and buildings. They want better buildings in which to live, well-equipped buildings for their livestock, better machinery that will do more and better work in less time at a reduced cost, and a good place to keep the same. All these developments have not only given new opportunities to the farmer; they have placed new responsibilities upon his shoulders, and have made new demands of his own ability to keep pace with the times. The most successful farmers of today are not those who can chop the most wood in a day, milk the most cows before breakfast or pitch the most hay working side by side with the hired men. These things are necessary, of course, but they now take second place. The successful farmer of the present is the one who has the best cared for and most complete outfit of farm machinery to meet his needs, and who can arrange his own time and work and that of hired help as to utilize this equipment to the best advantage. In short, the modern farmer is a manager who makes both machinery and men serve so as to accomplish big things for himself and his profession.

HOLLOW-TILE SILO, CONCRETE BLOCK MILK HOUSE AND COOLING HOUSE.—MODEST BUT CONVENIENT.

Any discussion of farm improvement, including farm machinery and modern conveniences as well as buildings, naturally divides itself into three parts. First we have certain implements that are already on the farm; we must consider their care, repairing and housing. Second, we have in mind a number of new and highly-improved machines that may not yet have come to the attention of the reader; of those we wish to say a word. Third, we cannot overlook the farm buildings and what they should hold in the line of labor-saving machinery and conveniences, nor do we think that the farmhouse should be overlooked in speaking of such improvements.

HERD OF PURE-BRED HOLSTEINS BACKED BY A PALATIAL SET OF BUILDINGS.—WOODLAWN FARM, MEDFORD, MINN.

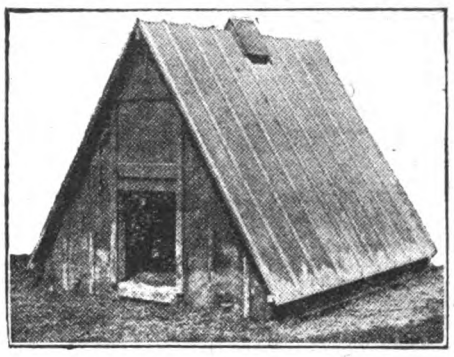


A Machine Shed Saves Time and Money

Two of the commonest sources of annoyance on the farm are the inability to find smaller tools quickly when they are needed, and the breakdowns that occur to machines in use in the field during the rush season. You have "cussed" these things yourself and so have we. But in a majority of cases a good machine-shed would do away with the cause of both. If there is a place for things it is easier to keep everything in its place. And breakdowns in the field are often due to neglect or failure to shelter the working parts of complicated machinery from rain or melting snow. We know that rust increases drag, that it is a sign of depreciation, that it is a warning; but still we allow machinery to stand outside the year around then expect 100 per cent. efficiency and no breaks or delays when it is next used. No, we don't all feel this way about it, but there is no farmer who can't give examples of neglect and the consequences.

Many farmers voice the opinion that it does not pay to build machine-sheds and use them for the protection of their machinery. They say that machines will wear out from steady use before the effects of exposure to the weather will be seriously noticed. Perhaps there may be some backing for this argument on the very large farm, but we have our serious doubts; on large farms several machines are required to get the work done in time, resulting on a saving in wear and tear to any single machine. Therefore each implement would last every bit as long on the big farm as on the small. To our way of thinking, any machine that is worth having at all is well worth keeping in A-1 condition. This can be done only by having it under cover when not in use. There is no available data to show the relative life of machinery housed and not housed, but observation indicates that housed implements last longer, give less trouble and cause fewer delays in the field, and look decidedly better. This last point may strike the reader as being unimportant. It is far from that. Why? Well, in case a farmer is selling out, he usually has an auction sale, doesn't he? And the bidder judges the age and the value of any piece of machinery by its looks; an old, weather-beaten, rusty, paintless plow or hayrake will be discounted. Therefore, from the standpoint of sale value, it pays well in dollars and cents to "give your machinery a home."

It is good business to reduce the cost of machinery storage when possible. To do this, barn driveways, alleyways in corn-cribs and lean-to sheds are the most common makeshifts. But there is sure to come some time during the year when machinery must be moved from place to place, and the constant temptation to leave it outside. We are all human; we all try to save steps, especially in the rush of haying time or harvest. For that reason the small machine-shed seems to be the only solution to the housing problem.



A shed having space for all the machinery found on a well-equipped farm of 160 acres will require a length of 36 feet and a width of 24 feet. No foundation is necessary; posts may best be set securely in concrete, and the floor should be raised slightly and tamped compactly with a mixture of earth and cinders. This slight "crown" and a shallow ditch or drain around the outside will take care of water from heavy rains or melting snow. Tastes differ as regards the arrangement of doors, some contending that sliding doors along one side serve all their needs, and others insist that both sides should have doors to permit driving in on one side and out on the other. We are inclined to favor the latter arrangement, personally, but, as we have said before tastes differ. The doors should be at least 10 feet wide to accommodate the widest machines; wider if larger implements are to be housed. If an automobile is to be kept in the shed a portion should be partitioned off. Better still, build a small garage at some convenient point on one end of the shed, and reserve it solely for the car and its accessories. Too often we have seen the garage used for anything from an emergency chicken-house to a calving-pen, and though these makeshifts may have seemed to be necessary they could have been avoided somehow, it seems.

THE LAST WORD IN DAIRY BARNS.

The Farm Workshop

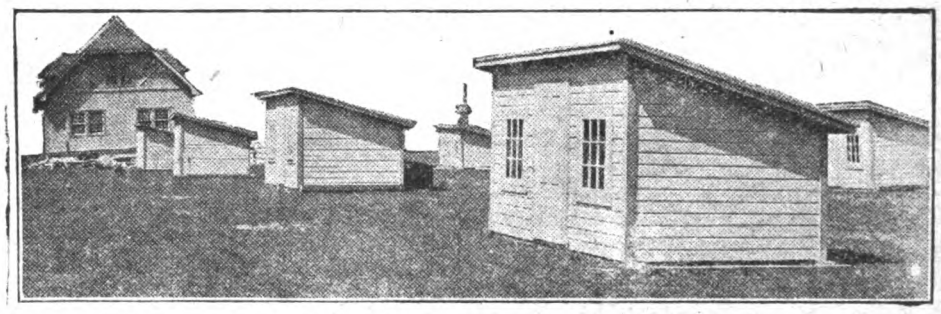
On any farm "a stitch in time saves nine" in any number of ways besides having the good wife mend a rip in your overalls. The farmer must be able to make minor repairs to machinery of all kinds, and there is no greater inducement to do such repairing right at the time they are noticed—for this is the time they should be done, before we forget them—than by having a well-equipped workshop with tools and forge and vise and work-bench. We have noticed that the man who has to take time to have repairs made when he is busiest in the field is the man who has no shop to work in. Shop work is, to our way of thinking, the best time saver on the well-regulated farm and there is no better way to spend rainy days or idle hours than with a file or hammer or emery-wheel "tinkering" on some machine in need of repairs. Preparedness was a word we heard often during wartime, but it also has a strong peacetime application on every farm. It is unusual to find a farmer who cannot make repairs and who is not handy with tools; his calling requires that of him. Therefore all that is needed is the place for him to work in, so let's see what is required.

PORTABLE COLONY HOUSE FOR SOWS AND PIGS ON PASTURE.

A workshop need not be large or elaborate in any respect, nor need it represent any great outlay of money. Perhaps the commonest and handiest arrangement is simply to partition off one end of the machine-shed, leave a wide door between the two, and put in several double sash windows to supply sufficient light. A concrete floor serves as a secure base for fixed machines if mechanical power is to be used for running the grindstone, drill-press, etc. It also lessens danger from fire if the shop contains a forge, and it should have one to be complete. Fire risk is a thing that few farmers give the thought it should receive.

Needs vary from farm to farm and the equipment that should be found in any workshop varies likewise, but certain things are indispensable in all. For instance, we have already mentioned the grindstone, emery-wheel, forge with bellows and work-bench. A small anvil may be made of an old piece of railroad iron a foot or so in length. Other blacksmithing tools may be made as they are needed by a handy workman; old files or pieces of scrap-iron or steel make pinchers or hooks or punches, etc. Assorted wrenches, drills and screw-drivers are needed, and should be kept in drawers or a visible rack. Pulleys are required with belts and shafting when electric power or the portable gasolene engine are to be called upon as a source of power.

We will not attempt to list the things that can be done in the workshop. That depends on the farmer himself. But it is certain that there will be disc blades and plowshares to sharpen, sickle bars for the mower or binder to repair and adjust, clevices to make—any number of rainy-day jobs that can be done in spare time. Then, too, if accidents happen to machines or small repairs are found necessary, it will frequently be found that a trip to town for replacements or repairs will be unnecessary when the vise and the forge and the drill and the tools are all there waiting to be put to work. Time is money, and much of these two can be saved by the handy workshop.



Keeping Abreast of the Times

In farming as in every other line of work there is a constant change going on; old methods are pushed aside by new ones, and to keep in touch with this constant change is an important duty of the farmer. We have said that agricultural advancement may be measured in the rate and extent of improvement of agricultural machinery. But how can the farmer himself keep in touch with these constant changes? He has little time for reading, we admit, but if reading is considered rather in the light of a pleasant duty and not just as a pleasure he will find that he gets over a lot more ground beside the reading lamp each evening. That is just one way, however, though it overlaps a bit on some of the others.

There is no region so far away from town or so sadly isolated by bad roads that farmers cannot get into some county seat for the county fair once a year. We don't mean for recreation alone, though it is true that the missus and the kiddies like to make the trip, and deserve it, too. At state fairs, county fairs, even at conventions and farmers' meetings, exhibits of machinery have come to be regular fixtures. At these are displayed the newest and best in the line of both the old and well-known and the newer things in the line of farm machinery; better still, there is always a demonstrator on hand to point out the new features, and to explain carefully just how any complicated-appearing piece of machinery works. There is no better way to find out what is going on in the realm of machinery improvement, what new "wrinkles" have been patented, than by slowly walking back and forth along the rows of exhibits at some fair. With several manufacturing companies exhibiting their wares in competition, and their demonstrators talking loud and long in competition also, no farmer can spend half a day to better advantage than right there with his eyes and ears open.

Then there are catalogues and bulletins on machinery. Get those that you noticed the other day in the office of your local machinery salesman; send to several of the big manufacturing companies you have noticed advertising in your farm papers, and write for machinery bulletins to your state agricultural college. When you get all this literature together, sit down by your reading lamp and go over it until you know just "what's what" in the machinery line. You may not be thinking of buying a complete new machinery outfit—few of us could stand the drain on our pocketbook all at once—but reading costs not one cent, remember that. If you are "posted" then you will know just what you want when the time does come, you will know the strong and weak points of each machine; in short, you will know the why and the wherefore and use this knowledge when it comes to paying out your money. Nor is it always real economy to postpone the date of buying as long as "we can make the old ones do." With so much to be done in a working day, and the summer over before a fellow can realize it, we feel that the sooner the new machine that works efficiently is put in the place of the old, worn-out one, the better for the farmer and his pocketbook.

Have you ever thought of making use of your county agent as an adviser regarding new machinery? And what about taking a week or so off each winter and running down to your state agricultural college for the farmers' short course? Remember that both the county agent and the trained staff of teachers and investigators at the college are hired by you, so don't feel a bit backward about making the most of their services. They can help you, and are only too glad of the chance to prove it. At the college you will see the latest and best in machinery; perhaps, if it is winter, you will see new machines at work in the field (in moving pictures). You will come home "just bustin'" with new ideas that have been tried out for you at no expense to yourself, and you are free to make them your own.

New Machines and Farm Equipment

We are afraid that to enumerate all the recent advances in machinery would tire out every reader of COMFORT; we are certain that before we finished the chore we would be suffering from writers' cramp. All that we can do in a limited space is to mention briefly a few of the most important ones that have a rather general usefulness on any farm, no matter what region of the country it happens to be located in. We make just this one reservation: that we will confine ourselves entirely to machines that have been carefully tried and that have proved their usefulness and dependability.

TRACTORS for almost every kind of farm work, whether on the large farm or the small, are now on the market and are rapidly coming into more general use. We are not of the opinion that they sound the death-knell of the farm draft horse. From our own observations and experience we are convinced that both horses and tractors will work harmoniously on the same farm, and this is the way it seems to be working out in actual practice. The "horseless age" is not yet at hand, but the mechanical age, in which efficient, economical, time- and labor-saving machines are indispensable, is at hand. Tractors of small size and a number of makes are suited to general farm use, performing any job from pulling a wagon train to running the saw or silo filler or feed grinder. Larger and more powerful ones may, briefly, be said to do the same kinds of work, but more quickly. On the wide prairies of the Dakotas or Nebraska the 30 horse-power tractor that plows, discs, drags and seeds all at once is an accepted reality. On the hilly farms of the New England States or in the frontier districts of northern Wisconsin, Michigan and Minnesota the smaller tractor, either wide-wheeled or caterpillar tread, is doing everything from ordinary field work to clearing land and plowing new breaking. As we watch the noisy little puffers at work we feel confidence in the ability of machinery to replace man power, but realize more strongly than ever that "headwork" on the part of the thinking farmer is essential to success.

PLOWS, discs, mowers, binders and packers all show several new features worthy of attention. There is a growing tendency to use the two-wheel truck to support pole weight and keep the implement "on an even keel," taking this load off the horses and distributing weight. Then there are special attachments that make possible the use of either horse or tractor power. Plows for breaking swamp land are now made in 24-inch bottoms for either horse or tractor. Also, an entirely new thing in the plow line is the new brush plow with a highly-arched beam or throat giving 24 inches or more clearance. These plows are pulled by tractor, and have given good results in standing brush up to 15 feet in height and three or four inches in thickness, turning them under the furrow in a satisfactory manner. Double discs and giant discs, as well as disc-packers and disc-drags, are now made for either horses or tractors, and are meeting with approval. More durable and friction-lessening bearings in mowers and binders are receiving attention on the part of manufacturers, and larger power binders and mowers that take a wide swath have made their appearance on the market.

cylinder and push-bar loader puts the hay just where it is wanted on the rack, does not clog, and attaches to the wagon with a flexible tongue that prevents jolting and twisting on rough ground. The side delivery rake lays even windrows that the loader picks up nicely. In the machines used in the hayfield, as in a number of other fields of advancement, we notice that speed has been gained with no increase in tractive resistance, and speed often means the difference of hay of finest quality and hay damaged by rain and sun.

MANURE SPREADERS show several new features. Some have been dropped down lower between large wheels that lessen the pull; others have a solid box bottom instead of the slatted bottom. This is an asset when the spreader is used for the distribution of commercial fertilizer or lime, as it prevents the loss of any through the bottom slats. The solid bottom also retains the juices of barnyard manure until the spreader reaches the field. Distributors of several new styles have made their appearance, the object being to give more even distribution over a wider swath, to eliminate clogging or packing, and to break up clumps of manure. Gears or chain drives are in most cases housed in such a way that dirt is kept out. In short, a lot has been done to remove some of the more justifiable criticisms that have kept the manure spreader from becoming the universally popular and valuable machine it deserves to be.

POWER HOES and especially adapted power cultivators have been perfected for the gardener or the nurseryman and, in fact, for anyone who has formerly found use for a hand cultivator. They are found in varying sizes and styles, some having two wheels and some just one. A variety of shovels, etc., adapts them for an unlimited number of uses.

SILO FILLERS, corn shredders, etc., have been altered somewhat with the purpose of eliminating accidents. "Safety First" for the farmer has been the trend of development, and gears, blades and other dangerous parts have been covered or placed out of reach. Fillers having anywhere from three tons capacity per hour with a small gas engine to larger machines that will cut 15 tons or more cover the needs of the small farmer or the farmer who has several silos to fill as quickly as possible. Uniform cutting even when run at full capacity has been gained as a much-needed improvement.

Improved Buildings and Equipment

During the war and for some two years thereafter little building was done on farms for the reason that building costs were so high and that labor was both scarce and expensive. Besides, the production of increased crops took precedence over all else. Now that times have changed, we see a marked increase in the tendency to replace old barns and even farmhouses with new and modern ones, made possible by sharp decline in cost of building materials and somewhat lower cost of labor. Also, most farmers have come to look at up-to-date buildings that are convenient in arrangement and that have the facilities for doing more and better work with less labor, as necessary, not a luxury. And they are right.

Dairy Barns and Silos

With the rapid expansion of the dairy industry we find new barns and more silos in place of old. The balloon-framed barn with ample mow room for clover hay, a good ventilation system that works, plenty of light figured at the rate of 45 square feet for each animal, litter carriers and feed trucks, metal stanchions, and easily-cleaned concrete floors show the trend of the times.

INDIVIDUAL DRINKING CUPS were laughed at a few years ago by dairymen, but now we find that they have won their way into all the best barns. And there is good reason for this. A good milker will drink 10 to 15 gallons of water each day, and heavier milkers will drink still more—if they get it. Furthermore, a cow drinks at least 10 per cent. more water at night than in the daytime—if she gets it. About two and one-half pounds of water are required for each pound of milk, but in cold winter weather no cow will drink this much as she stands out in the cold wind and shivers beside an ice-choked watering trough. Drinking cups quickly pay for themselves in increased milk production.

MILKING MACHINES in their present state of perfection are perhaps the greatest labor saver ever invented for the dairyman. They replace cheap labor with skilled and dependable labor at a reduced wage. Considered as an indispensable part of the barn equipment for some time now in all large dairies, they are coming to be considered in the same light in any number of smaller dairies with 10 to 15 cows, also as a solution of the milking problem. Proof that milking machines are a success is easily found by any dairyman who will try for himself or trust to the judgment of the leading dairy authorities of the country.

SILOS are still built of a great variety of materials in several styles and sizes. Cement, cement stave, cement block, hollow tile, wood staves of dozens of types—all these are used as they have been for some time. But by this we do not mean that there has been no recent development in silo construction. There has. Little more can be done to improve the cement or the hollow-tile silo, but wood silos show several new features. A wooden hollow-tile silo that provides an air space within two layers of staves is a marked departure. New anchoring and hoop-tightening devices are notable advances. Easily adjusted, secure and wind-resisting tops also are worthy of notice. Doors that fit snugly without binding and effectually keep out the air and in the juice have added to the list of useful changes. See front cover illustration.

Generally Useful Conveniencies

FARM LIGHTING PLANTS, or the utilization of electricity brought in by wires from central power plants (see front cover illustration), deserves its growing popularity on the modern farm. In the barns as a substitute for the old-fashioned lantern, with which our parents and grandparents spent gloomy hours each morning and night, we now find the handy light-switch that brings a bright and safe light in a jiffy. In the granary, the machine-shed, the milk-house, the feed-room or even in the haymow, we have light ever at our beck and call. No danger from matches or from the tipped over lantern or lamp. Then there is the outside light beside the garage door, at the kitchen porch and at the windmill—all places where we formerly used to stumble and fumble in the dark.

In the house there are so many uses for electricity that we cannot mention all, but in addition to light (and that alone is sufficient to warrant the outlay) there is the power washing-machine, churn, cream separator, the electric flat-iron, and power to operate the pressure water system (see front cover illustration). Speaking of electric power, we must not overlook the feed grinder, the fanning mill, or even the grindstone, etc., in the farm workshop. Then there is the small portable gasolene engine that serves various power purposes. We would like to go into greater detail relative to the cheap first cost of lighting or power plants, when the all-around usefulness is considered, but we must find a good stopping place. And where could we find a better place to linger in comfort than in a modern, comfortable farmhouse where there is good light, running water and all the conveniences that the good wife and girls need and appreciate? As full working partners in up-to-date farming in which the maximum utilization of machinery of all kinds is the very keynote of the day, we cannot help but look to these needed things for the inside of the house; they should be ranked with the new farm machinery in importance, and to our way of thinking they should even be given precedence, for we only live once and our happiness is in a sense measured in the smiles on the happy faces of others for whom we do a good turn.

ing you a drawing I made of my pony Topsy. I hope to see my letter in COMFORT.

Yours hopefully and sincerely,
REVA A. RALSTON.

Reva, in your very declarative letter you say, "I am a new friend." That is the best sort of a declaration and makes me happy to hear it. You may be sure, my dear, that I am an old friend of yours from now on.

I think your twenty-four scholars have picked out a most appropriate name for a school located in a Scotch Grove when you call it "The Timber." Of course an institution with that name must be run by a School Board, and I suppose you just pine to get to your maple desk every morning. Billy says that what I have just written wooden make anyone laugh, but I think it is rather funny myself and worth a grin from anyone but a nasty, bad-tempered game-legged old Goat.

I was sorry to hear you had a niece who died with the influenza, Aunt Reva. Probably I have a great great many more nieces than there are trees in Scotch Grove, but I know I would not want to lose the tiniest one of 'em. In New York last winter we had plenty of this mean and tricky flu, and one of my bestest friends was very ill indeed with it. Fortunately, he soon got so well that he could eat six meals a day and in twelve hours consumed seventy-eight cents' worth of store milk. I say store milk, Reva, for here in New York we never expect that any milk we buy ever saw a cow or was produced by anything more bovine than a pasteurizing outfit.

That was a most delightful sketch of a very handsome pony which you sent me, Reva, and your pet had a white stripe down her equine and aquiline nose just as you described. Why don't you have Topsy enter The Timber School, Reva,—if the Board will let her—and see if she can learn how many quarts of oats there are in three pecks?

GUNLOCK, UTAH.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

Just a few lines to let you know that there is a boy in Utah who has life enough to write to you. We have taken COMFORT for years and I certainly enjoy it—especially the cousins' letters.

As it is the custom, I will give my description: I have blue eyes, brown hair and a healthy tan. I am seventeen years old; five feet, seven inches high; and weigh 150 pounds. In fact I am rather handsome.

I live in the heart of the wild and woolly West. And yet, when I read Western stories, I can only wish I could see such places as they describe. Unlike most Western boys, the trade of busting bronchos goes against my grain. In fact I would be afraid of getting busted myself if I tried it. I am not very enthusiastic, but you have got to show me if the beautiful scenery of Utah can be beat, or is beaten. Especially southern Utah. And as to agriculture, there is hardly a fruit or vegetable that cannot be raised here, and we have abundance of water. I am surprised at not seeing a cousin's letter describing my wonderful State.

Gunlock is an old-fashioned little town surrounded by hills. It is also a thriving little place and certainly worth living in.

I want the cousins to write to me, so I am sending a blank, well-salted piece of paper for Billy—and thus hope my letter may pass unnoticed. Or at least I hope so. I am afraid my letter is getting too long, so I will have to close.

Your nephew, FRANK NIELSEN.

All right, Frank, just as you say! We are willing to believe that Utah is beautiful just as long as you do not make us come out to the Great Salt Lake Desert and ask us to admire the view. However, I know that Gunlock is a considerable way from the big desert—say about a day and a half in an active Ford—and where lucky Gunlock is situated there must be plenty of water. I am sure of this, else how would there be beavers enough to build mountains? For I see you reside close to the Beaver Dam Range, Frank, and if the winds from the far-off Salt Desert make you thirsty, you can get plenty of Santa Clara River water to irrigate your lips. I think you have a right to brag—surrounded as you are by peaks and rivers. And if bucking broncos are scarce, and movie bad men also, why you haven't missed much after all. One good thing about where you live, Frank, is that you have a sort of big corner lot. If you ever get sick of little Gunlock, you can just drop a boat into the Virgin River and soon be paying a poll tax in either Nevada or Arizona. I really imagine, Frank, as a West-ignorant Eastern dweller, that you must be living in one of the most beautiful parts of the wild and woolly country. Anyway, it is a good State that can raise every kind of a product—including "rather handsome" cousins! Billy looked with suspicion upon this remark of yours concerning your looks, Frank. He said that he thought your description, like the piece of paper you sent, must be taken with a grain of salt. "I notice he didn't send any photo for my album, Uncle," said Bill. Bill is a cynical old codger, Frank. Seeing is believing with him—and sometimes he won't even believe what he sees!

GOLDTHWAITE, TEXAS.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

After reading this month's issue of COMFORT I could not resist the temptation to write. First, before going any further, I want to get Billy in a good way so he won't chew up my letter, so I am sending him a couple of pictures to put in his album. While he is very much engrossed with these, you can slip my letter up your sleeve. The masculine-looking person is my brother's wife. Here, hold on and don't look so shocked: she is just a kid, and of course the other smiling maiden is myself. The water is a view of Lake Merritt, but only a bird's eye.

Say, Uncle, I do hope you can talk Billy into letting you print my letter. You know this makes the third or fourth time I have tried. I once heard from one of the cousins I would like to hear from again. If he sees this in print I hope he will recognize it and come along with a nice letter. He was in Los Angeles, California, the last I heard of him.

Uncle, I am in high school. I have four teachers. I am in the tenth grade and expect to graduate next year and then for college. Well, Uncle, as this letter has already gone beyond its limit, I must close. I trust you have no objection to the tint of my stationery. If so, let me know and I will change it to your liking. Please, all you cousins, write to me and I'll answer every letter. Try me and see if I don't.

With much love to all of you,
Your niece and cousin, LOIS SULLIVAN.

I was foxy enough to get your letter by Billy, Lois. The best way to fool Bill is to get him into an argument—and he is always ready to argue! I showed him your charming and smiling photo, and then I told him you said the other blank, watery-looking one was a picture of a bird's eye. Bill immediately snorted and cleaned his spectacles hastily by rubbing them along his left ear. After a close scrutiny, he declared: "Uncle Lisha, this photograph bears no resemblance whatsoever to the optic of any ornithological specimen I have ever encountered." It is awful, Lois, but Bill always uses language like this when he starts to argue, and it makes him very hard to talk to, at times. But this time, as you know, I didn't want to argue with him; I just slipped your pink letter (Billy is simply death on pink note paper!) out of his reach and told him I had heard there were very strange birds in Texas, and that I thought this bird's eye was from a water-fowl known as the Goldthwaite Wonder. Bill looked very unconvinced, but didn't say anything more, for he was in doubt whether or not I was kidding him. And so your letter was safe.

Lois, you must not expect to hear often from any California cousin like the one you mention. I very much fear, Lois, that this chap may be so busy hanging around the Sunkist Beauties of Hollywood and Universal City that he has no time to write letters. But perhaps if he gets a bird's-eye view of your letter in COMFORT, the bird may write.

I hope your four teachers keep on cramming you just full of knowledge, Lois, so you can graduate and commence writing us from your new college dormitory. But if you want these collegiate letters to be really safe from Billy, I warn you now that they had best come on maize, cerise or heliotrope stationery. Billy, as I said before, is simply death on pink!

BANCROFT, WEST VIRGINIA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I wrote you once before but guess something must have happened to it. I am five feet, three inches tall and have brown eyes and light complexion.

Uncle, there is a soup house in our town.

Say, Uncle, my birthday is in March, and I want you and all the cousins to send me a card. I would like to hear from some of the cousins.

Your loving niece, ETHEL CRANDALL.

I'm sorry, Ethel, but you'll have to move your birthday on a month or two ahead, or else wait until next March to be buried under cousins' birthday cards. COMFORT has such a tremendous circulation that it has to be made ready for printing a considerable time in advance, and so this has meant that your birthday cake will be cut and eaten—candles and all—before you read this. But I know all the cousins will join me in sending you the best of birthday wishes, even if they come a little late.

Ethel, that is a mysterious and disquieting sentence of yours about having a "soup house" in your town. Why build a house out of soup, anyway? I'd much rather have one made out of something drier—say roast beef, with the walls thickly plastered with creamy mashed potatoes and the windows shinily filled in with lemon water ice. And if the floors could be made out of soft gingerbread, laid in geometrical and delicious patterns, it would be all the better and make the house command a much higher rent, I fancy.

Billy, always looking on the gloomy side of things, has been trying to make me believe that your soup house is only an unfortunate but worthy institution where soup is given free to those too poor to buy anything better to eat. I hope Bill is wrong, Ethel, and that none of your Bancroft families have passed through conditions that bring them to depend upon outside charitable aid for their daily fare. One thing that makes me hopefully think Billy is wrong is that here in New York we have what are called "chop houses," and let me tell you, Ethel, that no one can go and get a free chop at any of these nicely-named places. In fact one has to chop a big hole in a ten-dollar bill if one attempts to get a square-round, or even octagon-shaped meal out of any New York "chop house."

Write to us, Ethel, and tell us that Bancroft, a town bearing the name of one of America's great—or perhaps greatest—historians, will not have to go down in history as having to deal out soup to its hungry citizens.

And, Ethel, when you write again you might tell us how old that birthday made you. What's the use of having a birthday if one does not know how old it makes one or how many candles to stick in the chocolate frosting?

PAPAIKOU, BOX 42, HAWAII.

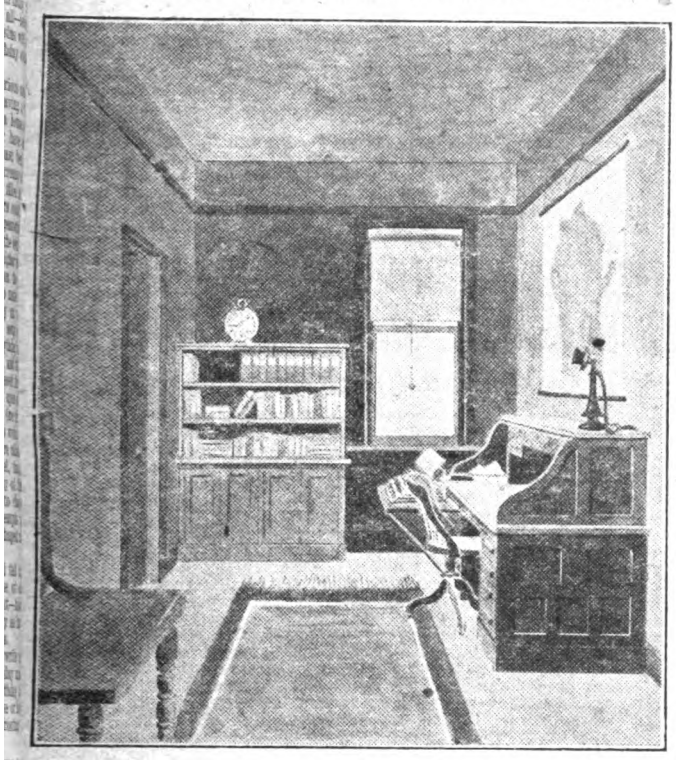
DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

The other day I was reading COMFORT and I said about the League of Cousins, and so I have joined it, too, as I love to read the letters and your answers. How old are you, and won't you please give your description, Uncle Lisha? I am seventeen years old, five feet, one and a half inches tall, and weigh 108 pounds. I have olive colored complexion and dark hair and eyes. I am attending the Hilo High School and I'll be a Junior pretty soon. I live in this little town about five miles from Hilo where I attend school every day, going by train. We have lots of fun in school and on the train. Uncle Lisha, isn't Charlie Chaplin the funniest thing? We always see him in the movies.

I hope you will publish my letter in COMFORT, and I will write as often as I can. I am always so anxious for COMFORT to arrive as I love it so. Mamma has been away for more than four months and I am very busy looking after my younger sisters, two of them, and my little brother. Father is at home with me, I am so anxious to have mamma return soon. She is in Japan taking a nice little trip.

I must stop now and go to work. You see, Uncle, I have to all the cooking, washing and ironing, keeping the house and sewing for my sisters. I have two brothers in Hilo, both older. They send their clothes over and I have to wash these, too. So you see I have quite a lot to do besides my school lessons.

Your loving niece, DIANA TAKAKAWA.



The nearest I have ever been to Papaikou, Diana, was to eat a can of Hawaiian pineapple and listen to a friend of mine play a guitar and that sweetly-singing native fashion which I like to imagine may sound its lovely musical meaning along the beach at beautiful Hoopulea. Kaluhaele and charming Laupahoehoe. Diana, I see that I shall have to let out a reef or two in my tongue before I can go out to Hawaii and have a chat with you and eat half-a-dozen bunches of big ripe bananas. Billy was greatly pleased with your letter and wants to make a trip to Hilo Bay as soon as possible. He thinks this would give him a chance to add some of your island flora to his herbarium, and he particularly wants to sample some taro root—which he says he hears tastes like raw cocoanut which has been kept too long. Your letter, Di, shows how far-flung are the borders of our happy family. You'll get steamer-loads of letters from cousins anxious to hear about your life and the pineapples, alohas, waikikis and other strange and delicious fruits of your sunny Pacific homeland. And if you reply in such perfectly scrumptious handwriting as that of your letter to me, you will show 'em all that one can learn to be a very fine pengirl in the schools of Hilo-on-the-Beach. There's lots of things you might have told us about your island, Diana, but perhaps you did not want to brag. Think of having two active volcanoes standing around smoking in one's back-yard! And a nice litle mountain like Mauna Kea—which is only 14,000 or so feet high when you get to the top. There must be a fine view over the aloah plantations and the pineapple forests from the top of little old Mauna. I'm certainly going to climb this hill when I go out to see you, and if Billy gets fatigued with the job, we'll let him slide back down on a surf board. Diana, you ask a hard question about my age. Sometimes I feel seventeen and sometimes a hundred and seven. I know I have been growing younger ever since I became an Uncle and if it keeps on I may have to start attending kindergarten again. But there is one thing sure: I'm not nearly as gray as Billy and I'm not so old and stiff but what I could get to the top of Mauna Kea with the aid of a derrick or two. There are many of the cousins who are astoundingly curious to find out just how bad I look and some even want to see Billy's countenance—pivot teeth and all. Perhaps when my new Uncle-ship is a little older, a way may be found. If Mr. Gannett is willing, to let the Family know just how much of an uncle I look and exactly how intelligently hungry Billy appears to answer, brave enough to face his gleaming eyes.

Improved Farming

HARD times are truly the acid test of all industry; the weak and insecure perish, and only those builded upon the enduring rock of sane finances and common sense survive. During the past two years agriculture, in company with every other form of human enterprise, has been severely buffeted and tossed about on the restless and stormy sea of uncertainty. The period of readjustment has been hard on the farmer, requiring a strong heart and will to meet successfully the problems he has been called upon to face. But the point is this: He has faced these problems with a smile of confidence; most of them he has already overcome; others, though not yet settled, it is true, he seems to "have on his hip" ready to toss out of the way. To this we may add the comment "as usual"—for is it not true that somehow he has ever managed to cope with adversity and to "come out on top"?

A SMALL BUT COMPLETE FARM OFFICE.

In spite of the hard knocks of falling prices, extortionate freight rates, uncertain markets and lack of adequate credit to finance his business, the farmer has a number of things to be thankful for. In the first place, it is safe to say that for him the worst is past, that the bottom has been reached and passed, and that now he can confidently look ahead to better things in the future. He was hit first and hit hard, but now while many other industries are still groping about in the dark he sees the light ahead and is steering straight for it.

Then there is another point to be considered, a point many of us have overlooked in our reckoning. It is this: The past two years have been rich in lessons plainly taught to the farmer. The weak spots in his business have been found, to his distress and discomfort at the time, no doubt, but found nevertheless. And in the years to come these lessons, if they are learned and put to good use, will fully repay us for all that has been lost in the past. Security is the purchase price of success; weak links in the chain from soil to market must be eliminated if security is to be attained for agriculture. And it is with these lessons learned under the lash of hard times that we look ahead. For as certainly as summer follows winter, as harvest follows seed time, so do peace and plenty follow close upon the heels of want and discouragement for the farmer who learns by experience, applies what he has learned, and "sticks to the ship".

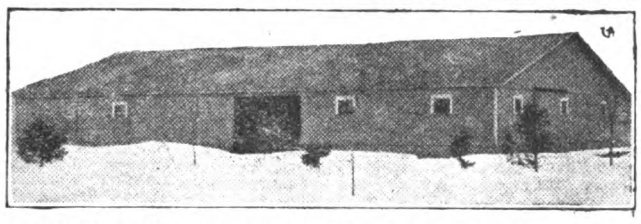
Now let us look for a moment at some of the more important things that have developed during hard times to make for a bigger and better agriculture—some of the silver lining that we may find in every dark cloud—for we already can see that new or altered and revised methods are securing better results. This much we know and, though it is only a beginning in the right direction, we feel encouraged as we "put a stout heart to a stiff uphill pull".



The things that have been learned and the forces at work toward the end of agricultural improvement may be classed roughly as the things the farmer is doing or can do for himself, and the things he is having done for him by others. Now let's see what they are:

Farming "From the Ears Up" Pays

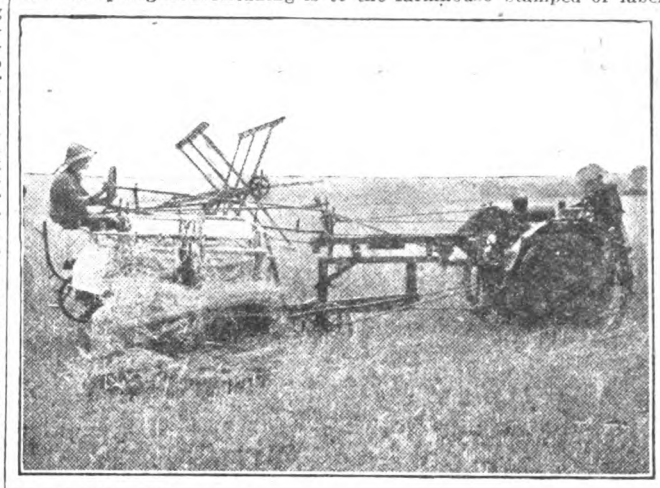
One of the most important lessons that the period of hardship, now past, has taught is that farming is a two-sided business, that brain must be used as generally as brawn, that to meet successfully the problems good business management is at least as essential as hard work. Neither is sufficient alone; the two form a partnership which work together to make agriculture both permanent and prosperous. To many farmers the occupation of farming seemed to call for hard work, and hard work only. It may have been true when prices were high, when supply was smaller by far than demand, but under the conditions existing today and those likely to exist in the future farming is a strictly business proposition which requires thought and work together. The man who uses his head every waking hour or, in other words, the man who "farms from the ears up" instead of down, is the man who will make most rapid headway.

The farmer who farms well, breeds and feeds the right sort of good quality livestock economically, hires extra help for farm work only when he knows that every dollar so spent will bring back more than a dollar in return, will make a profit because he earns it. Economy is, or at any rate should be, a habit of thought and not a matter of enforced pinching. Lavish spending which became a habit in the days of more than plenty is an unwelcome heritage that has left its blot on the record of many a formerly prosperous farmer. Is it necessary for us to advise that only such things as are necessary, such things as will add to the efficiency of the farm or to its income, should be bought? By this we do not mean to eliminate comforts and conveniences; anything that adds to the welfare of the farm family and helps to lift the labor load will stand the test we mention. But there is a broad line between investing money in necessary things and wasting it for things not necessary. Be sure you need before you buy.

"To stand still means to go back" is a business axiom that has direct application to the farmer. Physical growth ceases after a man reaches full manhood, but mental growth goes on and on if encouraged. And here lies the secret that has enabled the thinking farmer to survive hard times. Farming calls for the best there is in men who have prepared themselves for their business by constant thought and study as well as by experience. We can think of no other form of human endeavor which calls for such a diversity of knowledge; none which presents more problems difficult to solve. Can they be solved by hard physical work alone? We think not, and a look at past experiences will prove the truth of our statements. Pioneer farming in the past century was mainly a matter of arduous manual labor, no doubt, but today it is mainly a matter of business. It demands the constant application of sound business principles just as much as manufacturing or banking or merchandising. To those who realize the importance of the application of strict business methods to farming will go the reward for their work; the toiler who refuses to read the "handwriting on the wall" and who depends upon hard work alone will not keep pace with the man who uses his head as well as his hands.

A MACHINE SHED IN KEEPING WITH THE SIZE OF THE FARM SAVES DEPRECIATION OF VALUABLE MACHINERY.

The Lead-Pencil Farmer



"The lead pencil is the most important implement on the farm," once said a farmer who spoke from years of experience. And the fact that he backed up his remark with a fine big farm free from debt, a herd of pure-bred cows any man would be proud of, fertile and well-tilled land that year after year returned a profit in crops, and a bank balance that enabled him to provide both education and comfort for his family, adds strength to his statement.

Where does the lead pencil figure as a farm implement? In the first place it does much to take the guesswork out of farming, for figures don't lie. The farmer who keeps a pencil behind his ear will make close figuring a habit. He will know what everything costs him, whether it be the rations he feeds his stock or the time and labor of raising a field of corn. It is the little losses from day to day that make a deficit at the end of the year, but the lead-pencil habit keeps the figures where they can be seen all the time.

MOTOR HOE HOEING THREE ROWS OF YOUNG TRANSPLANTED LETTUCE PLANTS AT ONE TIME.

Then there is the next step,—farm accounting. Many farmers are "gun-shy" when bookkeeping is mentioned. They think of great ledgers in an office and an expert bookkeeper perched on a high stool laboring over them for hours on end. But in truth, bookkeeping, so far as farm needs are concerned, is not a nightmare. It is a necessary part of the business. For all practical needs of the farmer, simple books have been devised, and may be bought for small cost. A day book to show daily outlay and income will do much to keep finances straight and to take the guess out of farming. From this start it is only a short step, and a worth-while one, to a complete record of every farm transaction. The "lead-pencil farmer we quoted above has a daughter who learned bookkeeping in high school; she gladly performs all the necessary work of this kind in her spare time. No doubt a large number of the readers of COMFORT also have sons or daughters who have had a similar training and who would be equally glad to help Dad keep his accounts. In this connection let us advise strongly in favor of taking or keeping a farm inventory, for it is every bit as necessary to the successful management of a farm as spring housecleaning is to the farmhouse (and if you doubt the need of the latter we refer you to the good wife).

HARVESTING TEN-FOOT SWATH—ONE MAN CUTS 30 TO 35 ACRES IN A DAY.

The lead-pencil farmer always knows just where he stands and how things are going. We might say that the man who makes his mark with the pencil makes his mark in the world, for it seems to turn out that way. No dairyman would try to run his herd without a milk sheet tacked up beside the milk scales in the dairy barn, but what use would the milk sheet be without a pencil? Again it is figures that talk. The same holds true in the feed room, where it is not a difficult matter, though one often overlooked, to keep an accurate account of the feed that goes to each cow, to the hogs and to the horses. How else can we know if stock is "paying for its board" if we do not use a pencil and paper? We cannot remember a single farmer who ever made a success of farming by guessing at things, but we can name any number (and so can you) who made a failure of it by guessing. To take the guesswork out of agriculture will mean to substitute the dollar sign for the question mark, and prosperity for profanity. Use your pencil.

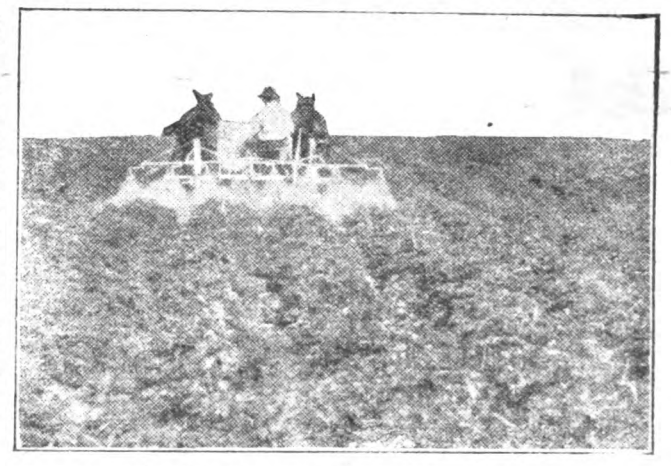
Marketing: An Important Problem

In the past farmers and scientists alike gave much time and thought to increased production and relatively little consideration to the actual cost of production, to say nothing regarding the marketing of produce. To make two kernels of grain or two blades of grass grow where one grew before was the primary object. But times are changing. Today agricultural advancement is along a somewhat different line, and agricultural thought has taken a new trend. Hard times have recommended economy of production costs as well as other savings; the standardization of quality of farm produce is receiving more and more attention, and in a measure the control of markets through direct sales is working out in actual practice. Several agencies are at work on marketing problems and are getting results. Various bureaus, cooperative associations and the federal and state departments of agriculture are all pointing their efforts toward helping the farmer to get better markets for his crops, but we will speak more fully of their work later on. For the present let us look only at the things the farmer can do, and is doing, for himself, for the problems of marketing intimately concern the individual farmer. Someone once said that marketing crops is a double-ended saw with the farmer at one end and the investigational bodies we have mentioned at the other, both pulling in turn for the general welfare of agriculture. What can the farmer do to "hold up his end"?

COST OF PRODUCTION plays a big part in marketing crops at a profit. It is essentially a problem for the individual farmer and is more fully under his control than is the selling price. Therefore he can do much to insure a profit for his produce by reducing costs of production to a minimum. By this we do not mean that soil fertility should be allowed to decline through over-cropping and failure to use fertilizers; neither do we mean that the necessary work can safely be neglected. We have in mind the elimination of waste. The "lead-pencil" farmer we spoke of figures every cost from the time a crop goes into the ground until it is sold; therefore he knows just what each item costs, and knowing leads to the rigid economy essential to success. Some of the most important items influencing the cost of production, and also the places where a little work with the lead pencil will be well rewarded, are: use of farm equipment and depreciation; labor of men and teams; value of land; amount of cultivation and care required from seeding to harvest; cost and amount of seed, manure and fertilizer; arrangement of crops, etc., on farm to save steps and time; selection of crops that do not all require attention at the same season, thus allowing the farmer himself to do more of his own work, and save wages; elimination of waste, whether it be caused by plant or animal diseases, insects, weeds, or natural spoilage. In general, it is safe to say that the more valuable the crop the more intensive may be the cultivation and the greater the outlay. But guesswork must be eliminated and a thorough understanding of every item of cost of production substituted in its stead in order to make profitable marketing possible.

STANDARDIZATION OF PRODUCT is more difficult for the farmer than for the manufacturer but it is every bit as necessary, but the farmer can greatly aid marketing by carefully grading farm produce. To this end it is even necessary to standardize methods of production to insure quality. Standardized methods of production in a measure forecast what the quality will be; yield per acre must not be allowed to overshadow the rate any given crop will command by reason of its quality. Excellence has a greater reward than amount, and with less drain on the land.

Extensive experiments conducted at the Iowa Experiment Station have shown conclusively that correct methods of fertilization, rotation, clean culture, use of good clean seed, and disease prevention will do much to improve the quality of any crop as well as the yield, and will to a large extent eliminate low-grade products.



The condition and appearance of produce as it appears on the market, as well as the quality of the same, are receiving greater attention, and increased returns show that the time and attention thus spent is well rewarded in dollars and cents. Careful grading, bundling and boxing or packing are the first things to consider. In doing this it is well to try to see through the eyes of the ultimate consumer, and to make things attractive from his viewpoint.

The advantages of carefully grading farm produce are too numerous to be listed completely here, but we can mention a few. In the first place, grading fixes a standard for the market. In the second place, a standard grade can be stamped or labeled and advertised extensively, to the farmer's advantage in that the public becomes acquainted with his "trade-mark." Third, the producer receives a premium for his properly graded produce of high quality, nor does he have to compete equally and to his own disadvantage with the farmer who places a low-grade or otherwise inferior article on the market to force down prices. Other things that careful grading does are: to make possible the advertising of a whole community as a source of any certain produce; to assure the success of community or cooperative marketing for a group or district; to improve the storing and handling qualities of an article; to save or eliminate loss through "dockage" when mixed or unsorted products are sold in bulk; to permit offering graded produce in storage as security for loans; and to increase the market for farm produce of all kinds by improving the shipping and keeping qualities by careful grading. These things the farmer can do himself toward securing better markets, for marketing is far less a "combine against the producer which makes him work for nothing" than was once generally believed.

Cooperative Organizations and Others

Hard times in the recent past have driven home the moral that "In Unity Is Strength," and the American farmer has learned that pulling together is one of the surest ways to reach the goal. Many are still holding back for the reason that they have an entirely wrong notion of the sense and meaning of the word "cooperation" as applied to the farmer. No doubt there is some reasonable backing for this idea; in the past the word often signified an organization wherein he and his friends were left "holding the bag" for a group of clever and unscrupulous promotors who flew by night and left only debt and disgust in their wake. But times have changed, and again for the better. Now we realize that cooperation is more than a habit of thought, a willingness on the part of farmers to pull together toward some common end, rather than an empty name for a trade-restricting, narrow-thinking, dues-paying group. And in the same sense and measure that it means pulling together, it depends for complete success upon sticking together. An inclination "to stick to the ship" only when sailing is good on a quiet sea, but to abandon it when the storm clouds gather, has been the stumbling block that has tripped up many a cooperative society.

In this connection let us read what Mr. Soren Sorenson, agricultural representative of the Danish Government, had to say on this point at the recent meeting of the American Farm Bureau Federation, at Atlanta: "In Denmark we have learned that if farmers are to cooperate successfully they must loyally follow their leaders, even when those leaders make mistakes! We have learned that farmers must cooperate even when it does not pay, if they are to carry their desires and ambitions out to their entire satisfaction. Half-hearted support is not one bit better than no support at all." When we think what the farmers of his little country have done, we appreciate the truth of his statements, and know that experience backs his statements.

FIELD SPRAYING THE BEST CROP INSURANCE. BORDEAUX OR LIME-SULPHUR KILLS BUGS OR PREVENTS DISEASE.

Space does not permit us to more than mention other organizations which are doing a wonderful work for farmers and for agriculture, but let it be understood that it is for want of space, not for lack of appreciation of the work being done, that we cannot go into greater detail. State and Federal Bureaus of Marketing; Farm Bureau Federations; Agricultural Experiment Stations throughout the country and in Washington; and the farm press itself with its millions of readers,—all these agencies are pointed toward the end of first gaining the true facts, then passing this knowledge along to the farmer himself. Speaking purely from what we have seen accomplished in the recent past, is it expecting too much when we look for great and rapid advancement that will make for a better, more permanent agriculture in the near future?

Through these agencies the American people at large are being shown that their future prosperity and welfare, and that of the nation, as well as that of the farmer himself, is bound up in the future of American agriculture. To bring about this mutual feeling of need, and to break down age-old narrow-gauge prejudices, in itself will do much to assure agriculture its rightful place. Throughout the country people are coming to realize that the farmers' problems are the nation's problems; that the nation's problems are the farmers' problems. And out of understanding shall grow faith.

It is to these organizations and agencies that the farmer may look for the fulfillment of his needs and desires. With the reduction of armaments a reality, he may confidently look for increased interest in "farmaments." When we think that in 1920 our Government spent four and a quarter billions of dollars, or ninety-two and a half per cent. of the total Federal budget, for armaments and wars of the past and future, and that only three hundred and forty-four millions, or about seven and a half per cent., went for the maintenance of Civil Departments, Public Works, and for everything else, is it not reasonable to look for more attention and financial assistance for the many things needed in agriculture, now that peace-time enterprises are coming into their heritage? We confidently hope that the good work so well started will be continued; that the interests of agriculture, including all needed facilities to promote the material prosperity, educational advancement and social well-being and contentment of the farmers and their families, will receive the fostering care and assistance that their importance and intimate relation to the national welfare demand and deserve.

Increase of the Daily Horizon

Diversified farming, in which the dairy cow and the farmer have worked so successfully as partners, learned much and suffered little even in hard times. Perhaps that is why the dairy frontiers are so steadily expanding, for it is in the former one-crop regions that we see the new trend to adopt the cow as a partner. Throughout the South and Southwest there is a marked demand for high-grade and pure-bred cows; the same holds true in North Dakota which so long has been considered as a wheat country pure and simple. Not so now. Permanent agriculture decrees that crops cannot be sold forever in the wagon-box. Something must be returned to the soil to prevent depletion of soil fertility. Wherever the dairy cow is found, and where crops are fed to her and then marketed in the milkcan, we have seen that farmers have been in better shape financially during the last two years. Soil is more fertile, yields are better and mortgages are fewer. Moreover, there has never been a complete failure of the dairy crop, for in a sense milk is just as much a crop as corn or wheat or fruit or cotton. The fact that this is realized, and that diversified farming is encroaching on the domain of former one-crop regions, is a move in the right direction.

Nor has improvement in dairy cattle failed to keep pace with the increase in area where cows are depended on by farmers for their daily bread and butter. For instance, the 43rd Holstein cow to make over 1,000 pounds of butterfat in a year was recently announced. Naturally, the cows that do this are the exceptions, but the general average of production and quality of cattle is also improving. Though only some three per cent. of all the cattle in the United States are pure-breds, the once common unprofitable "scrubs" are diminishing in number. It is purely a matter of dollars and cents that has seen the "boarder" discarded for the cow that will pay a profit, and for the most part we find that cows are being steadily and surely graded up.

New Lines of Work in Agriculture

To enumerate all the recent work done for the betterment of agriculture, and the various lines of research now under way in the State experiment stations and the United States Department of Agriculture, would fill volumes. But thanks to the free bulletins issued, and to the cooperation of the farm press which strives to bring these new things to the attention of farm readers, we will not be held to the task. Suffice it to say that new plants are being introduced and tried by the greatest and best trained staff of agricultural scientists in the whole world; that new strains of the plants we already have are being developed for special purposes such as disease or frost or drought resistance; that economical new rations for feeding livestock are taking the place of old ones; that labor-saving devices and the increased use of machinery instead of hand power follow experimental work done for us; and that soil management, fertility conservation, prevention of animal diseases and the marketing of farm crops are all receiving due consideration.

Among the important problems engaging the attention of experiment stations is the study of vitamines, with the result that many formerly-held theories on nutrition and the respective values of feeds are being modified. Results of the greatest importance have already been obtained relative to the influence of the various vitamines on growth, maintenance, reproduction, and the preservation of health of both animals and mankind. Along this line it may be well to mention recent legislation passed for the purpose of protecting unsuspecting customers from buying and using "filled milk", in which cocoanut oil is substituted for butterfat. Not only does this guarantee the rightful preference for the pure and unadulterated whole milk over an inferior article through the education of the ultimate consumer, and thus assure a market for our dairy produce, but it tends to protect above all else our growing children—the best and dearest crop of all—from being denied the growth-stimulating, health-insuring food supplied in the pure milk of the cow that has been so aptly termed "the Nation's foster-mother."

Among the new crops introduced or popularized and the old ones that have in some way or other been changed to meet some special requirement there is much of interest to farmers. Hemp is now grown on a large scale in Wisconsin, and its popularity is fast spreading to other regions of similar climate (see front cover illustration of new hemp binder at work). A new frost-resistant corn which germinates at low temperatures, yields well and matures early is meeting a great need for Northern States and the seed is even being sought by a number of foreign countries. Sunflowers specially adapted for silage are being grown under varying conditions from the cooler North to the semi-arid West with satisfaction and profit. Disease-resistant strains of oats, wheat and barley have been developed to meet special needs by a number of stations, and work along this line is being carried on unceasingly in the constant endeavor to improve farm crops. Growing flax for fiber has passed the experimental stage in Michigan as well as in some other more Eastern states; with Russia not in a condition to supply this product as formerly there is fair likelihood that flax fiber will become an important crop, especially in the more Northerly states. Soybeans, cowpeas and velvet beans, though not new crops, are coming in for more attention due to the results attained by their use on sandy land as builders of soil fertility.

Injurious insects, though still a constant menace to growing crops, seldom get "out of hand" due to better methods of prevention and control, and to an increasing willingness for farmers to make the most of the work that is being done for them. Quarantine methods are also getting results, especially in the case of the corn-ear worm, which has so far been kept within bounds in certain restricted areas. The cotton boll weevil is responding to crop rotation in quarantined areas to an extent that has already permitted the release of some formerly infested districts from quarantine. In animal diseases the close relationship between physical condition and disease infection has been shown, weak or poorly nourished animals being more susceptible to contagion and less able to withstand the ravages of disease than well-nourished, healthy ones. Contagious abortion of cattle is receiving much study and many experiments and attempts at its cure or control are under way. It has been shown that a large proportion of the sterility of cows may be blamed to this disease, the Wyoming experiment station stating that of the cows studied 50 per cent. of those that aborted became sterile.

We should like to say a word about the use of explosives for land clearing, about crop rotations and soil management to increase returns, about any number of things that we have not touched on, for that matter, but space is limited and must be saved for what is to follow.

The Farm Family at Work

We have spoken of the agencies that are helping the farmer by placing at his disposal the results of extensive experiments. In a measure this is merely an attempt to save him the time and expense and discouragement of learning many things by personal experience, for experience is ever a dear teacher. But in no sense should it be thought that this work is done for the farmer whether or no; the controlling idea is to help the farmer help himself. We have mentioned the thinking farmer, the lead-pencil farmer, who uses his head as well as his hands. We know that to work efficiently a man, and a woman too for that matter, must work contentedly. In congenial surroundings where labor-saving machinery helps lighten the load we find the men folks whistling at their chores and the "missus" singing as she works with the girls in the well-equipped kitchen.

By no means all of the changes for the better on the farm have been brought about by the men alone, nor are all the farm improvements to be found from the back-door of the dwelling out. The modern housewife is taking advantage of the new ideas in cooking, in feeding and caring for the growing children, the short cuts that save herself steps and time, in fact any number of things that are placed within her reach by her papers, bulletins, and the home demonstration agent that is trained in the work of helping the farmer's wife. A pressure system to provide running water is lightening housework and brightening every working day on a steadily increasing number of farms. Add to that the convenience of running water at the kitchen sink, the comforts of a well-equipped bathroom and the joys of the up-to-date laundry. The pressure system kills two birds with one stone, in a way, for it also supplies running water for the barns, the watering trough, for fire protection for the farm buildings and even lawn sprinklers for the lawn and kitchen garden.

We have said that the very keynote of farming today and tomorrow is knowledge, ever-increasing knowledge. In congenial surroundings we are more likely to study—and study and knowledge go hand in hand. Therefore a study corner for the farmer is a necessity, and more and more the small farm office is coming to supply this need. By an office we do not mean an elaborate and extensive room such as the city office. All that is necessary is the quiet corner of some spare room, or a pantry-sized alcove, for that matter. As regards equipment, that is a matter to be left to the individual to choose in keeping with his own needs and what he feels he can afford. A desk of some kind, a small bookcase or rack, a place to keep bulletins and farm papers where they can be quickly located when needed, fills the average needs. The typewriter is rapidly coming into its own on a growing number of farms, for, though not every farmer feels like attempting the job himself, with stenography taught in high schools the country over the children are only too glad to help out with farm correspondence in the evening. In dollars and cents the typewritten letter will soon pay for the cost of the machine on a farm where there is any amount of writing to be done.

The mention of the farm office makes us think of lights in the farmhouse. The kerosene lamp, with its smells and wick-trimming needs, is fast giving way to electric lights in both houses and barns. As for electric lights, the hour or two saved each day by the use of modern machinery on the farm, if spent in comfort beside a good reading light, will be the best paying hours of the whole working day. Farming is really developing with a book or paper in the farmer's hand, for the man or woman who does not read, and thus take advantage of the new things that can be turned into cash on the farm, soon falls behind. And a good light is the greatest inducement to read. Light and life have ever been congenial bedfellows, age-old and inseparable; darkness and discouragement and discomfort likewise go together. Good light on the farm illuminates the happy faces of father and mother and kiddies and old folks; the little tots with their toys, the young folks off in a corner looking ahead perhaps to homes of their own, and old age with its knitting or sewing and a smile for everybody. Ease, refinement, comfort, happiness—these are all enjoyed at home by the modern farmer, and the pervading atmosphere of congeniality is even measured in a willingness of the young folks to stay at home, too. If a better light will help keep the family together, and resist the attraction of farm boys and girls to the cities, this strikes us as the very biggest farm improvement of all—and it seems to be working out in just that way on the farms of the looking-ahead class of farmers the country over.

April Garden Work

"APRIL showers bring May flowers," and we welcome them as a proof of the coming summer, along with swelling buds and running sap. But April showers bring other things as well; they often bring delays in garden work, and in the garden-making month time once lost cannot be easily regained. For that reason we must make the most of each day when skies are smiling and sunny; tomorrow may be a day of weeping skies, lowering clouds and winds that are strongly reminiscent of March so shortly past.

Transplanting from cold frames to the garden varies with the locality and also with the season. When the season is favorable and the soil as well as the weather has warmed up planting may be done, if young plants are well hardened, without much danger of having their growth checked. Cabbage is seldom injured by cold nights and can therefore be set out earlier than tomatoes or other more tender plants that suffer from cold. What may now be planted in light soil with fair assurance of success had often better be delayed until a later date on cold, heavy soil, nor can plowing or spading be done while the latter is too moist.

As soon as time and weather have permitted thorough preparation of a mellow, friable seed-bed, planting may be begun. Radishes, peas, spinach, lettuce, turnips, beets, onions, etc., should be planted in a succession where space pemits, thus providing garden truck for a longer period than if all of each crop is planted at once. But we spoke of this some time ago when we told how to plan a garden.

Amount of Seed to Plant

One of the commonest mistakes in gardening is to use too much seed. The unavoidable result is crowding of the struggling young plants, weakness, and usually a severe setback which, even when thinned, cannot be completely overcome. The following table, prepared by the Kansas Experiment Station, will prevent mistakes if it is cut out and kept in a handy place and referred to when garden work is being done. The amount of seed indicated in each case is for 100 feet of row.

Asparagus	1 pt.
Beans, bush	1 pt.
Beans, pole	1 pt.
Beans, bush lima	1 pt.
Beans, pole lima	1 pt.
Beets	2 oz.
Brussel Sprout	1 pkt.
Cabbage	½ oz.
Carrots	1 oz.
Collards	1 pkt.
Cauliflower	1 pkt.
Celery	1 pkt.
Cucumbers	½ oz.
Cantaloupe	½ oz.
Egg Plant	½ oz.
Kale	½ oz.
Kohl Rabi	½ oz.
Leek	½ oz.
Lettuce	½ oz.
Mustard	½ oz.
Okra	1 oz.
Onion seed	1 oz.
Onion sets	1 qt.
Parsley	½ oz.
Peas	1 pt.
Peppers	1 pkt.
Potatoes	½ pk.
Radishes	1 oz.
Salsify	1 oz.
Spinach	1 oz.
Squash	½ oz.
Sweet Potatoes	60 plants
Sweet Corn	1 pt.
Swiss Chard	½ oz.
Tomatoes	50 plants
Turnips	½ oz.

How to Grow Lettuce

Lettuce, to be at its best, should be grown as rapidly as possible. Therefore the soil intended for this crop should be made both rich and mellow by liberal applications of stable manure, then thoroughly worked to put in a high state of tilth. The general crop which is grown outdoors, and not started under glass, should be sown just as early as the ground can be put in the condition we have described. Drills should be eighteen inches apart. Thin the young plants to four inches apart in the row, then as the plants grow and begin to crowd, thin them out and use as required. By doing this a much longer succession may be had from the same ground. For the cabbage or "head" varieties the plants should finally be thinned to twelve inches apart in the row to assure large heads.

Sanitation Keeps Pigs Free of Worms

It has recently been found that simple sanitation, requiring nothing more than a little extra labor and care, is a successful means of raising pigs free from worms.

Just before the farrowing season clean the farrowing pens thoroughly with hot water and lye. Wash each sow to remove all dirt from the skin before being allowed into the clean pens. Within two weeks after farrowing move sows and pigs to a clean pasture which has not held pigs since it was cultivated last; up to this time do not allow sows and litters out of their pens. Keep young pigs on clean pastures away from worms, hogs or other sources of infection for at least four months, after which time there is less danger from worms. By carrying out this sanitary plan, and supplying the necessary feed, water and shelter, it is possible to raise worm-free pigs to market age, thus avoiding a common cause of loss.

There are four reasons why this swine-sanitation plan means dollars and cents to the farmer. In the first place, pigs without worms grow to greater size and make more gain for the same quantity of feed than those that must use a part of their feed to "board" an army of worms. It has been shown also that when those parasites are kept under control fewer young pigs are lost from thumps. Pigs that are not weakened by the inroads of worms are less susceptible to the common pig diseases than are those whose vitality has been sapped by worms. The quality of pork produced by clean, healthy pigs is better than that from thin, wormy and unthrifty pigs.

Veterinarians state that pigs infested with worms seem to be more susceptible to mange, necrobacillosis, and possibly to other diseases than are those that have been kept worm free. Even when the latter are infested with mange mites they seem to be highly resistant to their attacks, the mites causing them much less worry or inconvenience than in the case of wormy pigs.

All swine raisers in the Corn Belt, or in any region which has suffered from the harmful effects of worms in young pigs, for that matter, should find it profitable to adopt this system of swine sanitation. Breeders of pure-bred hogs should find it particularly advantageous, for a little gain in size and weight, and the marked improvement in appearance resulting from rapid growth unimpeded by worms, makes a big difference in either the show ring or sales ring. In the end this advantage is measured in better prices received for stock sold.

Home-Grown Dairy Feeds Best

"So far as possible utilize home-grown crops as feeds for dairy cows. Add only enough purchased feed to balance the ration when necessary, furnishing ingredients that may be lacking in feeds grown on the farm, and adding to the variety. Do not buy feeds that are the cheapest in price just because they are cheapest. Buy those that will give the best results at the lowest price." This is the advice of Prof. R. S. Hulce, of the Wisconsin College of Agriculture.

If corn silage and alfalfa hay are available, one of the best and cheapest dairy rations obtainable is 30 pounds of corn silage and all the alfalfa hay that the cows will clean up. A mixture consisting of equal parts by weight of ground corn and oats, or of two parts of ground corn and one of wheat bran, may be used to supplement the alfalfa. Feed about one pound of this mixture for each three and one-half pounds of average-testing milk produced. A pound or two of cottonseed or linseed meal, if it can be bought at a reasonable price, can be fed each day to high-producing cows, but this is unnecessary for cows of average production. The above grain ration is sufficient only when legume hay of the best grade is used; it is not sufficient if hay of low grade is used.

Supply milking cows with plenty of fresh, clean water. Keep them in clean, warm, well-ventilated stables. Though the mention of these two points hardly seems to have place in a brief discussion of feeding rations, the best of feed is wasted if they are overlooked. Keep them ever in mind.

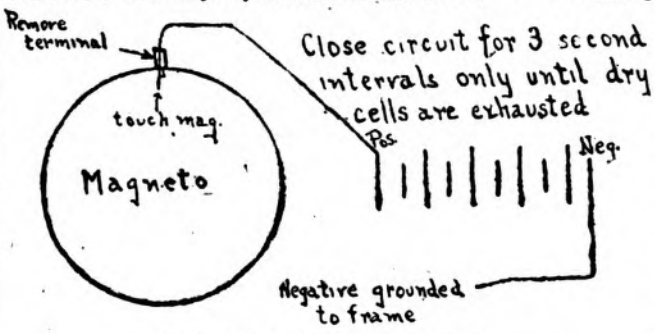
Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

Helpful Pointers

Carbon Monoxide



MANY owners will undoubtedly be possessed at this season with the "itch" to get out and tune the old bus up. One of the first things he will do is to start the engine so that the firing of the cylinders will furnish music to his ears. There is a "crepe hanger" to be tacked onto this display of enthusiasm and it is in the form of a warning to beware of carbon monoxide gas. It is a poisonous gas and is present in the exhaust from the motor. If your garage is small and closed up do not run the motor for any length of time. If you must have the motor running, open the doors and widows or, better still, connect a pipe or hose to the tail-pipe of the muffler and in this manner lead the exhaust gas into the open.

Putting Car Into Service

If when putting your car away for the winter you did not pour lubricating oil into the cylinders, it is an excellent plan to do so before putting the car back into service. Pour about a half cup of thin oil through the spark-plug opening of each cylinder. It is also well to use the hand-crank when first turning over a motor that has been standing for a long period.

Headlight Reflectors

Unless the headlight reflectors are very much in need of a cleaning it is good policy to leave them alone. The majority of reflectors are silver plated and, regardless of the care taken in the cleaning operation, it would appear that the surface does not take the mirror-like surface it possessed when new. If, however, the reflectors must be cleaned, dip a little bunch of cotton in alcohol and after blowing out all dust possible wipe the reflectors carefully. If it is found that the reflectors require polishing, use jeweler's rouge for the purpose. Dampen a soft chamois and dip it in the rouge and wipe the reflector in a direction starting at the bulb and working out to the rim of the lamp. Metal polish is not satisfactory for headlight reflectors.

CHARGING MAGNETO BY DRY CELLS.

Crankcase Oil

Do not throw away the oil that you drain from the crankcase of the motor. It may be diluted with gasolene or dirty, but if strained it can be used with excellent results for lubricating between the leaves of the car springs. It can also be used at most points of the chassis lubrication.

Answers to Correspondents

RECHARGING MAGNETO BY DRY CELLS.—Please tell me how to recharge a Ford-car magneto by means of dry cells, explaining how to connect them up, which side of dry cell is positive and which negative. My Ford is a 1917 model. A. D. J., Browning, Mo.

A.—This department has received a number of letters requesting the information which you seek, and in answer I have referred the writers to the August, 1921, number of COMFORT in which I covered this subject in detail, accompanied by an illustrative diagram which is reproduced here. As these inquiries keep coming, and many of the writers have not preserved their August COMFORT, I repeat here my former advice given in that issue; and I might add that I have since received several letters from COMFORT readers who report that they tried out this method with satisfactory results. I gained my information from a repairman who at one time did a great deal of magnet recharging and at times used dry cells for the magnets on your make of car. After coupling up five dry cells, he connected the negative side of the battery to the frame of the car, thereby forming a ground. He next removed the magneto plug at the top of the flywheel and formed a contact with the positive wire to the magneto. He allowed the circuit to be closed for three seconds' intervals only, and continued the charging in this manner until the five dry cells were completely discharged. Usually the dry cell has a center pole which is positive and one at the side which is negative.

CRANKS HARD AND GEARS STICK.—My 1915 Ford, when cold, will not crank without jacking rear wheel. After engine starts I have to speed it up and apply brakes on low gear in order to break high gear loose. Mutual connections seem to be properly adjusted. What is the cause of these troubles? B. O., Plazarro, Va.

A.—I am of the opinion that the difficult starting is due to end play of the crank-shaft. This condition causes the magneto magnets to be carried further away from the coils. Jacking the rear wheel and cranking from that end has a tendency to push the crank-shaft ahead, thereby bringing the magnets and coils closer together. The proper proceedure for correcting this difficulty is to install a new rear bearing cap that will take up all end play of the crank-shaft. If the proper field is not obtained in this manner it is possible to shim behind the field coils so as to bring them closer to the magnets. One repairman advises me that the rear bearing cap is reversible and if this has never been done on a motor, changing the cap around will often correct the end play. Regarding the sticking of the high-speed gear, I believe that this gear is in need of adjustment. Tighten up on the fingers and I believe you will help the condition.

STARTS HARD, CRANK-SHAFT TOO MUCH PLAY.—My 1918 model Ford starts hard on magneto unless rear wheel is jacked up. What is the cause? (2) The crank-shaft has some end play. How can this be taken up and magnets set up closer? H. C. R., Boon, Mich.

A.—The foregoing answer to B. O. covers your two questions also.

GEARING UP FOR HIGHER SPEED.—Have been getting some good stuff out of your Auto and Gas Engine Helps, so I will ask your advice in answer to the following question. I drive a Ford car about nine hours a day on country paved roads with only two hills that require the use of low; so I think that if my car was geared for higher speed I could use the greater speed to advantage in saving time and gas, too. I would like to know if I should put in a three-to-one gear (I guess that is what they call it, it is the next gear higher than the regular Ford gear), would it be easier on my motor and give me more speed? L. M., Canton, Ohio.

A.—You can purchase rear axle gears of different ratios from almost any accessory house. I have never been greatly in favor of the speed stuff as I have seen too much of the accident end to become an advocate of it. You are driving a light car which is not apt to hold the road very well at high speeds. Vibration also is a factor that cannot be ignored as at high rates of speed the vibration on certain parts is great and of course there is always danger of breakage. Do not misunderstand me. I am not a crank who strictly believes in a funeral-procession pace, but I am not in favor of the fellow who comes tearing down the road at a speed anywhere from 50 to 60 miles and who does it just because he believes the other fellow envies his driving ability and speedy car. I made a trip through the Eastern States last summer and do not believe I drove faster than 35 miles an hour during the entire trip. It was plenty fast enough for safety and I made good time. You would be placed to considerable expense for the new gears and their installation, which money would in the long run buy considerable gasolene. If, as you state, there are not many hills along your route you would probably experience no difficulty from lack of power and would enjoy a trifle better mileage to the gallon of gasolene. I have presented the matter to you exactly as I see it and you will have to be the judge as to whether the benefits you would derive warrant the change.

SEVERAL QUESTIONS ABOUT A FORD.—I would like information regarding 1921 model Ford in answer to the following questions: (1) How many gears are in mesh when a Ford is in direct drive? (2) Is the direction of current flow in the external circuit from positive to negative on discharge? (3) How many separators are found in each battery cell? (4) How many condensers in a Ford ignition? (5) What is the adjustment of the spark-plug points when using a high-tension magneto? (6) How many dead strokes has each cylinder of a four-cycle engine? (7) Can we pull with one broken rear axle? H. L. A., Cliffview, Va.

A.—Your first question leads me to believe that you do not fully understand the working principle of the transmission known as the planetary drive. The gears are never shifted into or out of mesh for the different speeds, but are always in mesh. It would require considerable space for me to describe the exact manner in which the speed changes are obtained, but, for your information, the entire transmission mechanism is clamped solidly together by a clutch for the high speed and revolves at motor speed. The Ford has the planetary drive transmission. (2) The direction of flow in the external circuit is usually from positive to negative. (3) The number of plates used in a battery cell determines the number of separators used. One of the best-known makes of batteries of the six-volt type is at present using 12 separators to the cell or 36 separators to the complete battery. (4) Each coil unit incorporates its own condenser. (5) Follow the manufacturer's recommendation as regards the proper gap to use for the spark-plugs. Usually the thickness of a smooth dime is about right. Many manufacturers furnish wrenches to which are atttached gauges for setting the breaker and spark-plugs. (6) A four-cycle motor has three dead strokes. The operations are as follows: suction, compression, power and exhaust. You will note that the suction, compression and exhaust strokes may be classified under dead strokes. (7) The great majority of makes of cars are equipped with a differential that applies the power to the wheel giving the least resistance. If an axle-shaft was to break, the power would be applied to that side since it would offer the least resistance. There are some differentials on the market that use pawls and apply the power to the wheel giving traction or, in other words, to the wheel that gives the most resistance. This type, however, is in the minority and it is safe to state that when an axle-shaft breaks the car cannot be propelled on its own power. The Ford belongs to the latter class and cannot pull if one rear axle-shaft is broken.

Old and Pleasant Custom.

Kissing is an established custom in all countries inhabited by white people who refrain at times from eating onions. It is a practice that insures the longevity and universal distribution of germ life and encourages the habit of matrimony.

Some one who didn't know much about kissing said years ago that stolen kisses are sweetest. The opinion is still qouted, but all persons who have had any experience of kissing know better. A kiss is never wholly satisfactory unless the kisser and the kissee show an equal degree of enthusiasm.

Kissing a pretty girl does not afford the unalloyed bliss it is commonly supposed to afford. If she has never been kissed before, her performance is crude and lifeless and, therefore, a little bit disappointing, and if she has been kissed too often she displays a degree of technique that robs the kiss of its flavor. In the old days the flavor of a kiss was imaginary; you couldn't taste anything but girl. But frequently the modern girl's kiss has the stale and unprofitable flavor of rouge. Some day a shrewd manufacturer will put out a line of rouge in all the popular flavors—vanilla, strawberry, lemon and the like—and then each girl can offer her young man the flavor he prefers.—Baltimore Evening Sun.

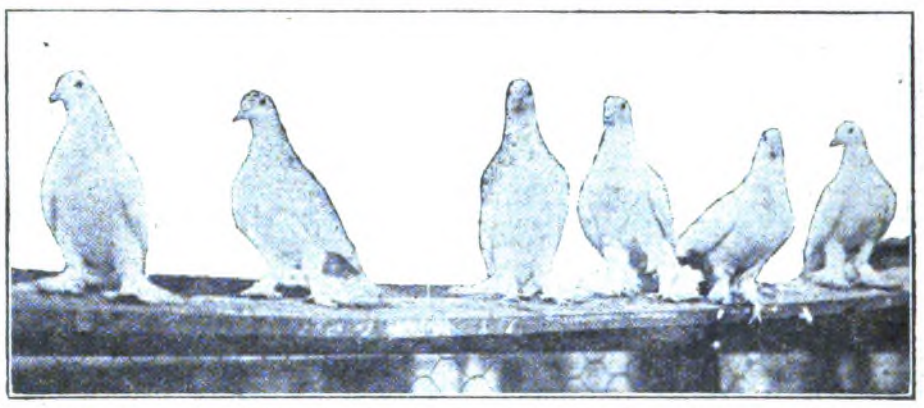
Poultry Farming for Women

BY KATE V. SAINT MAUR.



Why Not Pigeons?

THEY are the most profitable if well cared for, and especially appropriate for the man who has to be away from home most of the day or the woman with heavy household duties to occupy most of her time, because they won't overeat; food can be left before them all the time, and the parent birds take all the care of the young ones, so that an hour in the morning is about all the time anyone need devote to pigeons every day in the week, with a few extra hours on Saturday to clean up.

There is really money in the business if you are prepared to earn it. The people must understand that raising pigeons is a business requiring industry and management to make it a success. Unfortunately, a lot of nonsense has been written about pigeons and squab raising. Lots of people have run away with the idea that all they have to do is to buy a few birds, throw in a little corn night and morning, and make a fortune. True, there is no heavy work to be done, and a good income can be made on a fair-sized flock of Homers which are given intelligent care. For our selection must be Homers, because they are the best variety for squab raising, and squabs are what we must depend on for steady market returns.

Squabs from common mixed pigeons only weigh some six ounces when four weeks of age; are dark skinned, scrawny, and difficult to market; but Homer squabs weigh from twelve to twenty ounces when four weeks of age; are plump, attractive in appearance, and sell readily for four dollars a dozen in the wholesale market. Private customers will readily give forty cents apiece all through the winter. Every pair of good birds, well cared for, produce from ten to twelve squabs a year, which are ready to market at four weeks old; so they have not to be fed for long, and returns are quickly realized.

Mature Homers will cost about two dollars a pair from any of the recognized lofts, but it is no use buying birds elsewhere, for unless birds are mated pairs you may have another season wasted. Pigeons are faithful creatures which usually keep the same mates for life, and if one of a pair dies the survivor may refuse to mate a second time the same season. Young birds which are only paired at the time of sale, are likely to object to the mates which are chosen for them, and proceed to exercise personal choice when liberated among a flock of strange birds. So be wise, and buy only from reliable, experienced breeders.

THEY CAN ALIGHT WHEN FLYING AND SUN THEMSELVES ON A HIGH, DRY PLACE.

A comfortable house is essential, and the best plan for a small flock is to build a regular chicken house and cover it all over with tar paper or any of the good roofing papers. The yard must be completely enclosed with wire netting, covering the top as well as the sides, to keep the birds from escaping, and the wire cover should extend over the roof of the house and five or six feet above it, so the birds can alight on the roof when flying in the yard, and sun themselves (which they love to do) on a high, dry place. Put up two or three long perches at the end of the yard; a stand about three feet high in the center for a bathtub. Let the stand be a foot larger all round than the bath, so that the birds can light on it. The size of the house must depend, of course, on the number of birds you intend to keep. Just remember that each pair of old pigeons must have two nest boxes eleven inches square, with an earthenware nest pan in each. Nest boxes can cover the wall but must be out of reach of rats, which are destructive of eggs and birds. The earthenware pans are called nappies, and are manufactured on purpose for pigeons. They can be bought at any supply store for five or ten cents each. There is a brown crockery dish about seven inches across and two deep, which is to be found in most five- and ten-cent stores, that answers very well if you can't get the real things in your immediate vicinity.

In a box in one corner or fastened to the wall should be a supply of material for use of the birds in building their nests. For this purpose supply oak leaves or pine needles or tobacco stems; or if none of these are obtainable substitute clean straw. The benefit of mixing in the tobacco stems is that they keep lice away. But a plentiful supply of pine needles is equally effective in keeping lice out, and they have the virtue of keeping dry. Make the house as nearly rat proof as possible.

Now about feeding. Just throwing down cracked corn won't do. Variety in diet is necessary in birds' health as well as for man and beasts. It is wise to give the food question a little thought. Kaffir corn, red wheat, cracked corn, Canadian field peas, German millet and hemp are all staple grains. Use whichever can be had cheapest in your vicinity, and alternate them whenever you can. We follow the rule recommended by W. E. Rice, a very successful pigeon raiser: Morning—Equal parts of cracked corn, Kaffir corn and wheat. Evening—Cracked corn and Canadian peas. These regular meals are put into feed boxes in quantity sufficient to insure the birds having a constant supply. Treats, which we feed at odd times, such as millet, hemp and rice, are thrown on the ground; for, as they are only fed in comparatively small quantities, they are eaten up at once, and so there is no danger of their being soiled. Remember always to buy red, not white, wheat, for the latter is very apt to cause diarrhea.

Regular feeds are always placed in a self-feeder, so that the birds may help themselves. Peas, millet, hemp and rice are good only as treats once or twice a week. They are fed in small quantities, and alone, because we found out that, if mixed with other grains, the birds would pick out the dainties, and throw out the grain or wheat.

Unless starved to it, pigeons will not eat grain that has been defiled by lying on the floor, so to prevent waste it is best to have a self-feeder, or at least some contrivance which prevents birds getting their heads or feet into the supply and scattering it. The treats we feed by hand, and scatter on the floor, but if the birds are naturally eager for a novelty, it is picked up at once. Remember, that white wheat is very likely to produce diarrhea, so always order red, and don't be tempted to order new grain of any sort, or corn exclusively, for if you do, your birds will surely be troubled with canker. During the year, and especially in the early winter, I always receive letters asking why pigeons are afflicted with a strange disease of the mouth and throat, which looks like a cheesy growth; and it is for that reason that I caution you against the exclusive corn diet, for that is what caused the trouble, and often spoils the whole breeding season.

Once a week we give them a meal of stale bread which has been steeped in skim-milk and squeezed almost dry again, for we have lots of skim-milk, and the bread we get from a baker in town.

The parent birds take all the trouble and responsibility of feeding the young and raising them right up to the time they are ready for market. The hen bird lays two eggs, with one day intervening, which takes eighteen days to incubate. After the eggs are hatched, both birds devote their entire energies to feeding the youngsters for about two weeks, for both have power to secrete the predigested substance often called pigeon's milk, on which nestlings are exclusively fed for the first few days. At the end of two weeks the hen has usually laid more eggs in the second nest, so that by the time the squabs in the first nest are ready for market, the second eggs are ready to hatch. It is this double family which necessitates two nests for each pair of birds.

Cleanliness is even more imperative in the pigeon house than in the henhouse. Never neglect to scald out the earthenware nest, and whitewash the compartment it stands in, every time squabs are removed for market, for it is only by such rigid system that the place can be kept in sanitary condition. Pigeons must have salt, shell and charcoal to be healthy, so there should be a self-feeder with three compartments in each house. When ordering, specify that the oyster shell is for pigeons, as it is to be broken up smaller than for the hens. The rock salt and charcoal should be ground to about the size of rice. During the heavy breeding season crush most of the grain, and always peas, for when the parent birds are rushed for time between their two nests they are very liable to pick up whole grain and feed it to the young birds before they are able to digest it. Until we discovered this carelessness, we often had a dead squab in the nest. The feed boxes can be filled up, as the pigeons never overeat, and must have access to food at all times when they have young ones to feed.

If you start with a few pairs of birds, the best way to increase the number is to sell the squabs, and use the money to buy mature birds, for it takes pigeons six months to reach maturity, and it is necessary to have two extra houses in which to keep the growing birds, as they should not be allowed to remain in the regular brood pen. If, however, you have specially mated birds and desire to raise their progeny, you must watch the nests, and as soon as the young ones get out on the floor (the old ones generally push them out when the eggs in the second nest hatch), they can fend for themselves, and should be removed to a nursery house, where all feed should be cracked to the size of rice for several weeks. When one desires to build up size and good points, it is necessary to have two nursery houses, and so be in a position to select the best birds from different parentage to mate.

To illustrate: the nestlings from one side of the house should go into nursery number one, nestlings from the other side into nursery number two. Our nurseries are only seven by ten feet, so we never have more than twenty birds in each, and they can be taken within a few days of each other, in this way making very little difference in age when it comes to mating time. When the younger ones in the nurseries are between six and seven months old, we take a bird from each and put them into a mating cage, which is really a coop, four feet long, two and one-half feet deep and two feet high, which is fastened up in a corner of the feed house. The coop is divided into two compartments by a wire netting door. A bird is put into each compartment. If they are male and female, they will commence within a week or two to coo and talk to each other through the wire, at which time the compartment is fastened up to the top of the cage, and they are allowed to have the run of the coop for three or four days, after which they are put into a regular breeding house, where they will soon take possession of the nest. If, however, the birds chosen simply ignore each other after they are put into the mating cage, one of them is removed to another cage, and two more birds are taken from the nursery house and put into the two compartments. In this way we go through the nests until we have them all paired.

Preserving the Surplus Eggs for Winter

This is the season of the year when eggs are plentiful and cheap, so the wise housewife should lay by a supply for winter. First, the eggs should be infertile, and should be quite fresh. Don't use any from stolen nests without testing them. Candling is the safest way of testing.

Do this in a darkened room. If you have not a tester put a common lamp, lantern, electric bulb or any other light into a box. Have a hole in the box smaller than an egg and directly opposite the light. The box should also have a hole at the top to release heat and smoke.

Hold the egg, with the large end up, close to the lighted hole. If the egg is perfectly fresh and good it will look clear, its yolk but faintly outlined. The air space will be hardly visible, only one-eighth to three-sixteenths of an inch in depth. If this air space is larger, with a movable lower line, it means the egg is becoming stale or becoming weak and watery. Any small, dark spots that may be seen are usually blood clots. If heat or germination has been doing its work, large dark spots, blood rings or shadows will appear. A very dark or black egg with a large, fixed air space is a fertile one with a well-developed chick. When dark and with a large air space showing a movable lower line, it has become rotten.

Keep the nests clean and gather the eggs twice a day to prevent the shell being soiled. Washing in soapy water is injurious, for it removes the substance which fills the pores of the shell and protects the egg from germs. Should an egg get slightly soiled, a cloth dampened with vinegar will remove the stains without injury. But if it is very dirty don't try to preserve it. It is hardly necessary to say that a cracked egg is not fit for packing.

The question of a container comes up next. The best is an earthenware or stone crock or jar. It won't rust or leak or "taste"—it keeps the eggs in fine condition.

A five-gallon crock will hold fifteen dozen eggs. Clean it thoroughly, scald and dry. Put into it nine quarts of water that has been boiled and cooled. Add one quart of sodium silicate or water glass, which you can buy at the drug store. Stir well together. Set the eggs carefully in the crock. If you have not enough to fill it at once put them in from time to time. Be sure the solution always covers them by two inches. Cover the crock with a tight lid or waxed paper tied down, and set in a cool, dry place.

Carefully selected eggs laid down in this way will keep from six to twelve months. The authorities admit that they are likely to deteriorate a little after the sixth month. We are assured that for that length of time they are good enough to serve in any form. But if you boil them they will crack because of the expansion of the air in them. To avoid this, puncture the large end with a pin before putting the egg into the water.

Water-glass solution should not be used a second time unless it has kept quite clear and is free from odor and thick sediment.

O. R. C.—Blackhead—a name which is very misleading, as the head turning black is only one of the symptoms which develop occasionally when turkeys are in an advanced stage of the disease which is especially characterized by sores in the cecum and liver, which are caused by a protozoan which has been named Amœba meleagridis, a minute protoplasmic animal, found to vary between six- and ten-millionths of an inch in diameter. While they are microscopic in size, they are at least three to four times larger than the red blood corpuscles, but they are, nevertheless, small enough to float in the blood capillaries of the portal system, from the cecum to the liver, where they seem to be stopped from going further. This short description of the parasite contains all that is of general interest. It may be summed up as follows: the amœba is a microscopic animal or parasite capable of living within the tissues of the turkey, its host. It can, therefore, eat, grow and reproduce itself in large numbers, thereby causing irritations, destruction of the tissues, and nearly always death of the invalid turkeys. The majority of young poults die after a day or two of drooping. Adults may droop longer and pass into carrier stage of the disease. Refusal to eat and standing apart constitute late symptoms. Starvation in chronic cases produces thinness. When the disease in the cecum is slight, it is doubtful if the affected animals have diarrhea, which is more or less present in other cases. In many of the older poults the droppings will be light and stained orange yellow; this is the most characteristic symptom of all. Sometimes there are blackish blood clots in the droppings, indicating slight hemorrhages. Experiments show that more than four-fifths of the young poults exposed to infected yards die before they are six weeks old. The disease has been popularly supposed to be one confined to older birds. It is notably a disease affecting young turkeys, but one from which the older turkeys do not escape. Of the one-fifth who do escape or survive its ravages, at least ten to twenty per cent. may die, throughout the year, at almost any age. Examination of the organs is the only sure means of telling the cause of death. The germs are transmitted from diseased turkeys to the ground through the droppings, which contaminate the food with which they come in contact. Evidence obtained here indicates that the amœbæ may also be carried by ordinary fowl, and may be transmitted by them to turkeys in the same manner. So you see once again the importance of exercising strict cleanliness is impressed upon us poultry people, for if droppings are removed regularly, there is little danger of infection. Plow up the old yards and ground where poultry usually congregate. Disinfect the coops and houses, and don't let the turkeys roost in the same house with the hens. An open shed is the best place for them, even in wet weather.

C. M. S.—The bird is crop bound. Give him a tablespoonful of oil. Work the crop very gently in your hand for a few minutes, then hold him by his feet with head hanging down, and continue working the crop very gently from the breastbone down to the neck. In this way you may be able to push some of the contents out of the crop. If you succeed in pushing even a very little out, it will help the congested condition, and make room for another tablespoonful of oil, which will work off the rest naturally. Put in a small coop, and don't feed for twenty-four hours. If relief has been effected by the end of that time, give him just a few crumbs of stale bread which have been soaked and squeezed out of milk. If the crop is only partly empty you can administer another dose of oil. If you can remove nothing when you work the crop, there is no use wasting time; better open the crop at once. You must get someone to hold him firmly on his back, then pull up the outer skin, and with a sharp knife make an opening about an inch and a half long, being careful that it is only in the outer skin. Then pull it to one side and make a very small cut in the crop itself. Take a mustard or salt spoon, or even the handle of a teaspoon, and very gently and quickly remove the contents of the crop; after which, pull the crop together with a few stitches, using a needle and white silk, if you have it. Tie the thread, then cut it. Now pull the edges of the outer skin together, and stitch them in the same way, being extremely careful that none of the stitches go into the crop, for if the crop and the outer get stitched together, it will cause untold trouble, and entirely spoil your operation. Keep him in a small coop for a few days, and give a very little soft food.

Z. H. F.—Please read answer to "A Subscriber."

H. A. I.—Please read answer to O. R. C. It is too late to treat breeding stock now. It would interfere with the fertility of the eggs. I cannot supply plans of the house you refer to. Incubators can be started at any time, no matter how early, if you have a heated brooder house or a warm room in which to locate individual brooders; otherwise it is better to wait until the end of February or even March. Eggs that are going to be used for incubation should be kept at a temperature not lower than 60, and not higher than 65, and should be turned once in every twenty-four hours.

A SUBSCRIBER.—I fear you have to fight an epidemic of malignant roup, which is a most contagious disease, but as many forms of cold resemble roup so closely as to make it almost impossible to be sure without personal examination, I may be wrong. The one unmistakable symptom of the true malignant roup is the stale, offensive odor which is always present. Open the bird's beak and if there is no odor on the breath you may be sure it is only a roupy cold they have, which will be comparatively easy to cure if taken in time. But if neglected, the cold is always liable to develop into roup, so it is always advisable to treat the birds for that disease without waiting to be sure of the extent of the trouble. Remove the birds that show signs of illness, and confine them in coops in some sheltered outhouse, far removed from the chicken house. Disinfect house, nests, feed and water dishes, as a protection to the rest of the flock. The sick birds should be fed very lightly on nutritious food, and treated as follows: Dissolve half a teaspoonful of permanganate of potassium in a quart of water. For use, dilute one tablespoonful of the mixture with four of water, and spray the bird's throat, nostrils and eyes twice or three times a day for a week or ten days. If the bird is not considerably better at the end of that time, it would be advisable to kill it and burn the carcass. Don't use any of the birds that have been attacked in your breeding pens, no matter how well they may seem to be in the spring, for if you do, the chicks are almost sure to be weak and slow to develop, and in many cases show unmistakable signs of rheumatism and kindred ailments.

ALTHOUGH true manners have their base in the heart and really consist of unselfish thought for the enjoyment and welfare of those in whose company we may be, yet there have necessarily become established a large mass of well-tried customs and forms which constitute the "etiquette of good society." It is this we all wish to know, yet it can be no reflection upon a boy or girl to be ignorant of these mysteries of manner if youth has prevented the goings and coming in the world where these things are acquired. In this column of COMFORT it is a pleasure for me to help young readers whose doubts concerning the right thing to do or say might really spoil for them the enjoyment of some friendly party or other gathering, and wish to learn the little things that will give them sureness and ease so that they may get the most fun out of social life. I wish to add also those older readers whose secluded lives, perhaps along quiet paths, have kept them out of touch with the forms of society. These subscribers may, upon occasion, wish to know some certain right thing to say or do which will not leave them feeling strangely "out" when in the company of those more experienced in the little-big things that make up modern etiquette. In addition to replying in this column to specific inquiries, I am going to begin the brief handling each month of some point or branch of etiquette which time has taught me may be of most value to readers. Thus I hope this department may grow more broadly helpful—in the way that COMFORT wishes all of its service to readers to become.—Editor of Manners and Looks.

B. F., Weinert, Texas.—One would not ordinarily indicate or "point out" any person by the use of finger or thumb. A few words of description are much better, such as: "That man to the right of you with the brown hat on," or some such explanatory phrase. This ruling holds good generally in so far as it regards objects, also; but there would be nothing incorrect in indicating a certain direction by the motion of the hand in a case where the gesture would add clearness to the words used.

MRS. G. C., Lowman, N. Y.—Some dining cars serve table d'hote meals—which means that a certain list of courses of food constituting a complete meal are served for one fixed sum, regardless of how much or how little of the foods presented for choice is consumed. It is "food by the lot," so to speak. In such a case you would simply select your preferred dishes from the menu given you—which will be found to offer a slight variety as to soups, meats, desserts, etc. The second method of dining-car service is called a la carte and might be designated "food by the piece." Each dish on the list of foods is separately priced, and the cost of a meal varies according to the number and prices of the foods chosen by the individual. It is usually customary on dining cars for the waiter to present a small pad to the diner who writes upon this the selected dishes—generally leaving the prices to be filled in by the management. The waiter in a dining car is tipped at the end of a meal—the customary amount given being at least ten per cent. of the check. (2) A porter in a parlor or sleeping car is tipped at the completion of his services when the journey is ended. This tip may vary according to the amount of service given, the length of the trip and the number in the party.

MISS A. W., Mississippi.—It makes absolutely no difference who is the first to say a word of a greeting when a man and woman pass upon the street. (2) In serving as an escort a man does not take his companion's arm or offer his own, unless some danger or difficulty in the path should make this aid needful.

MRS. R. T., Ohio.—Any entertainment which you might wish to give for your second wedding anniversary—the so-called "paper wedding"—may be made most interesting and amusing without much expense. Send your invitations at least a week ahead in the shape of paper dolls. Each doll should have pasted to hold in her hand a card on which you have written something like this: "Mr. and Mrs. Blank J. Dash request the pleasure of your company at the celebration of their second wedding anniversary, 234 Dash Avenue, Comfortville, Ohio, on April 29th, at eight in the evening." You will, of course, change names, date and time to suit your occasion. You may have your rooms decorated with wreaths, strips and flowers made of crepe paper of your favorite color combined with white. Have all your lighting effects shaded in this manner. Buttonhole bouquets of white paper carnations might be given to arriving men guests, and pink paper roses to the women. You may have dancing if you wish, and also play any games in which paper plays the chief part. A home paper chase in which a trail of tiny squares of colored tissue paper leads to hidden prizes is a well-planned and easily arranged fun-maker. Use different colored papers for your trail—red for the men, for instance, and white for the women. The prizes should be paper articles of some sort—either home-made or purchased at small expense. Have your refreshments grouped on a table covered with the colored crepe paper on which you have placed paper doilies of white. From this table your refreshments can be served buffet fashion to your guests who may eat and group themselves anywhere about your rooms. As a centerpiece for your refreshment table have two paper dolls representing a bridal couple standing under a paper arch with a paper bridal bell swinging above their heads. Two kinds of sandwiches, coffee, cake and ice cream will make simple and sufficient refreshments. You can add to this a salad if you wish. Serve everything in paper dishes, plates, cups, spoons, etc. With a little thought and time expended upon your preparations, you can make your friends long remember your paper anniversary.

VIRGINIA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS AND MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been a subscriber to COMFORT for nearly twelve years. I want to thank Ever Cheerful of Tennessee for her advice on neighbor's children. It worked fine. I have four children of my own and a neighbor's little girl used to come here every day and stay nearly all day. I tried your method of having her sit down and keep perfectly quiet and it worked like magic. She was soon ready to go home.

How many believe in handing over your and your children's outgrown clothing to mothers less fortunate than yourself to make over for their children? Of course you have to understand the woman before doing this as it might offend her. So many people fill their attics with clothing rather than give it to the needy. I make shirts for my boys out of wornout skirts. I made underwear for my oldest boy, thirteen, of wornout underwear of his father's. They could be cut down and the good portions used to advantage. They lasted all winter. I made shirts for my youngest boy from the shirts of the oldest that were worn so he couldn't wear them any more. The families around here have had a hard time this year. Taxes are high and so is everything we have to buy and everything we have to sell brings a low price. We own our home, which is one great advantage as we don't have to move around.

I was married when very young and feel that God has been with me. I married a good man and one who is devoted to me. He is good to his children. We have only one pocketbook, his and mine, though I do most of the spending. I sometimes wish he would do the buying so he would know how much it takes and how it goes, although he never complains. I try to buy as wisely as I can though I often make mistakes but when I do my best, I say, what is the use to worry. It doesn't bring it back.

I was the oldest of a large family and we were very poor. My father and mother are living and I try to make up to them for the joys they have lost. Mother has worked hard all her life, as father's health was poor.

I hope to see this in COMFORT.

Much love to you all.

BROWN EYES.

WARREN, OHIO.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

After reading the inspiring letter by the Struggler, I could no longer keep silent.

When one finds in this busy, grumbling world of ours, down in its very midst of "common-old-everydayness," a soul as sweet and pure as that of the Struggler's, 'tis time we grumblers sat up and took notice! We go on day after day, year after year, treading the hard paths of life, some of us growing into hardened cynics or chronic pessimists, and others of us losing our very soul and individuality in the daily grind for bread.

If we would but take a moment's reflection on lives of our fellow-men around us, we can always find those whose lot is worse than ours, whose struggles are harder than ours, whose life holds just a third of the joy and sunshine of ours. Yet, they can look into our faces with a smile, and grasp our hand warmly in friendship and talk about daily matters with a free and easy grace!

You, dear Struggler, opened my eyes in time. I am yet young, not quite twenty. But I have started on the long path of Life and have gone but a little way. Yet I've been wearing smoked glasses and have been looking at Life with a darkened vision, for I thought that there could be no "hidden pot of gold at the end of the rainbow" for me! As everything seemed so opposed and contrary to what were my highest ideals; folks I thought were true friends were but "wolves in sheep's clothing," and that I could not trust in man with that simple faith that is a part of me. In sooth, the "rose-colored" spectacles Divine Providence has endowed to all youth, had to be cast away too soon!

But perhaps I can put them on again; for with renewed courage and experience as my teacher, I shall start anew, and as Excelsior of old, hold my torch high and aspire to greater things.

I would enjoy corresponding with any of the sisters and especially those interested in poetry, religion, or me. I shall leave my address with Mrs. Wilkinson.

"DREAMER."

RIVESVILLE, W. VA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been a reader of COMFORT and think more of it than any other magazine we take. I get much help from the sisters' letters.

I have been married two years and have one baby, George Donald, five months old. He weighs nineteen and one-half pounds and has always been a strong, healthy baby. We think he is the only boy in the world. Am sending you his picture and hope to see it in COMFORT.

I am five feet, five inches tall, weigh 125 pounds and have red hair, grey eyes and a tanned complexion.

With love and best wishes to all,

MRS. GEORGE E. KENNEDY.

WELLINGTON, 215 South B St., KANS.

COMFORT SISTERS:

After reading a recent issue of COMFORT I made up my mind to write a letter. Some time ago I wrote a letter and some recipes but only the recipes were printed. A little later I received a nice letter from a sister in Casco, Maine, asking me if she might use the recipes in a cook book she was making. She wanted recipes from each state in the union. The money she received from the sale of these books was to be turned over to the church. We have kept up a correspondence ever since.

Aunt Sally-Lou, may I ask a question? How many times does love come into a woman's life? This is my opinion. God has mated us and for each woman there is a right man, not two or three or as many as we may take a fancy to, but one true mate. It is true, of course, that many a girl has thought the right man had come, and married him only to find out her mistake. Is this wrong or right? I am not saying that second marriages are not right, for the first man may not have been the right one.

I think too that God intended all of us to be mothers. I have two dear little girls. There is only thirteen months difference in their ages. Ruth Norma and Dorothy Geraldine. They were born by Cæserian birth. Both times the doctors said I couldn't live but I came up out of the Valley of the Shadow for God knew they needed me and although by giving birth to them I lost my health, I wouldn't have it any other way for all the world. They are the sunshine of my life.

M. M. of Nebraska, I think you are right about motion pictures. We can find sin in anything we want to make sin of. What man or woman, girl or boy, is there that could see the motion picture, "The Old Nest," without feeling they couldn't do enough for their mother? That picture makes you see more than ever what you owe your mother. After seeing it I came home and wrote to mother. Thousands have seen the picture and if half that many mothers' hearts were made glad by a letter from her child, then didn't the picture count for something?

I was twenty-one years old the 22nd day of last October, so you see I was married when I was very young. My husband works for the Santa Fe R. R. Wages have been cut once and another cut is talked of. Rent has not come down though nor other things.

I would be glad to hear from some of the sisters.

Good luck to all.

Sincerely, MRS. VERNON SCRIVENS.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In writing this department always sign your true name and give your address; if not, your letter will receive no attention. Name will not be published.

LAST month I was so excited over housecleaning that I forgot to mention our New Year resolution—that of taking up and correcting a fault each month. Nobody has written me about their faults yet, and I'm getting tired exposing my own all the time. Come on, be good sports and tell us about the worst fault you had and how you overcame it. Then I'll tell you another one of mine. Here's one that most of us have—not showing appreciation. I never thought much about it before, but I was made so happy over a letter received this month that I began to wonder why folks weren't more appreciative when it costs so little, and then I began to wonder why I wasn't? Honestly, I felt terribly ashamed of myself. Do you want to know what the letter was that set me to thinking? It was from a dear girl in North Carolina who told me that my talk and the poem used in this department last August, helped her to decide an important question in her life and to decide it the right way. It pleased me so I almost cried. I'm giving nine-tenths of the credit to the poem and printing it again.

"I have to live with myself and so
I want to be fit for myself to know.
I want to be able as the days go by,
Always to look myself straight in the eye.
I don't want to stand with the setting sun
And hate myself for the things I've done.
I don't want to keep on my closet shelf
A lot of secrets about myself,
And fool myself as I come and go
Into thinking no one else will know
The kind of a girl I really am.
I don't want to dress myself in sham.
I have to live with myself and so
I want to be fit for myself to know."

IDA, Tennessee.—Growing up with a boy, playing together and going to school together isn't conducive to romance, not the thrilly kind, and, as you say, he seems like a brother or a friend to you instead of the wonderful, mysterious person you've dreamed about. However, romance doesn't always last, and when it goes it must be comforting to have friendship to rely upon. So many marriages are based upon love alone and when love vanishes (acute love, anyway) there's nothing left, not even congeniality. It is a safe plan to marry the man you admire, trust and respect as a friend, if you didn't love him as a husband. I rather like the title, Friend Husband. I don't say that this applies in your case. Unless he is mature beyond his years I'd say that he was too young to marry.

VIOLET, Georgia.—It would be very wrong for you to marry this divorced man against your parents' wishes, and it isn't honorable of him to suggest it to you. He is older in years and experience than you, and should protect your youth and innocence—and ignorance. Whenever I hear of a man getting a divorce because his wife flirted and went out with other men, I wonder to myself if she wouldn't have been all right if he had treated her differently and given her the love and polite attention he did before he married her. Other men are willing to give it and the woman whose husband is neglectful is more likely to go wrong than the woman whose husband treats her as his sweetheart. Possibly if you married him you'd be neglected just as his other wife was, and then you'd be tempted to flirt with some man—and most of them are ready for a flirtation. He may have been entirely blameless and his wife all at fault, as so often happens, but don't be in a hurry to marry even at that. Look around a bit first. You wouldn't buy a hat first without looking first at the different models shown in the various stores, would you? A husband is more important than a hat, yet you are willing to grab the first man who offers himself.

E. N., North Dakota.—There may be a lingering doubt in his mind as to whether or not he still cares for his sweetheart of former days so that he wants to see her to settle the question once for all. The chances are he will think to himself, "What do you suppose I ever saw in her? I wouldn't give three like her for one smile from my "E. N." However, if there is a doubt in your mind it is better to have it out with him now than worry about it as you are doing. Tell him how you feel and ask for a truthful answer. If he still cares for her the knowledge won't hurt so much now as it would for you to learn it after you had become his wife.

V. D., Oregon.—It is rather difficult for me to advise you, not knowing any more about the people you mention. It seems it would be best for you to marry the one you care most for, regardless of the financial side of it. Looking at it from a purely pecuniary standpoint, the student may earn more money after his graduation than the other, and it might be well to wait for him. Long engagements are uncertain, though, so there you are. Looks as if you had to decide for yourself.

STELLA, N. Y.—You are rather an unusual girl to complain because your sweetheart wants to go out so much. Most girls complain because they aren't taken to more theaters, dances and parties. Maybe he dislikes it as much as you do but thinks that in order for a farmer to make a good impression on a city girl, he must show her a good time, so she won't think him slow and a tightwad. Tell him how you feel about it and that you'd enjoy a quiet evening at home with him. That ought to please him. Of course if you want to get rid of him (foolish girl) you should tell him so and not let him think you care for him when you do not.

MARGARET, Arkansas.—Well, anyway, Margaret, he can't be with the other girl very much if he spends Sunday and five evenings a week with you. Don't be so stingy. It seems to me you are laying up a fine lot of trouble for yourself, as a wife, if already you have so little confidence in him. That's a terrible way to begin; time enough for all that later on. Don't you think you had better postpone your marriage until he is of age, at least? Then you could feel a little more certain that he knew what he wanted, and maybe you wouldn't want him then. Marriage and all its attendant responsibilities would interfere seriously with both your work and his. Be a nice, sensible girl and wait three years. Then you'll say, "Wasn't Cousin Marion a wise old soul? I'm so glad I took her advice." I wonder if you will.

LLEWELLYN, Georgia.—The life of an old maid sister, who devotes herself to her brothers and sisters, is usually a thankless one, and your brother's behavior now doesn't promise much for the future. The chances are good that before many years he will marry and you'll then be without a home and maybe without a father; so if you feel sure of your fiance's love, marry him and take your father with you, if necessary, but don't attempt getting married and living at home with your brothers. That would mean trouble. The difference in your ages isn't enough to worry you unless he is of an immature type. Lots of men never save money until they marry and their wives save it for them, so work together for a home. At that you won't have to work any harder than you do now, but, if I were you, I'd stop working in the fields. The woman who works beyond her strength suffers for it eventually, and the help you are to your husband for a few years is offset by years of ill health or invalidism.

MARY S., Pa.—Attend the church nearest your home and meet the young people of the church. Explain matters to the minister if necessary. (2) Of course you could learn to dance. Why not?

A DISCOURAGED GIRL, Iowa.—Don't consider yourself a failure because you haven't succeeded in a business career. Lots of girls don't, and you really haven't given it a fair trial yet. It may be that you are not fitted for work of that sort but would meet with wonderful success along other lines. What appeals to you more than anything else? Nursing involves enormous responsibilities and hard work. Don't take it up just for the sake of doing something. There are other professions open to women besides nursing and stenography. Explain to the woman who helped you that you appreciate all she did for you and that you hope to make good in something. Your business education will help you even if you take up something else. Don't worry, you'll be all right now that you realize your weak points and are striving to overcome them.

OLEVIA, Va.—Not all men are demonstrative and your sweetheart may belong to the undemonstrative kind. They are usually more sincere than the fellows who make a fuss over a girl all the time. Study him, then if you think you would be unhappy as his wife, don't marry him. Tell him why and give him a chance to be different.

JAZZ HEART, W. Va.—Don't let foolish pride stand in the way of your happiness. If he has repented and asked forgiveness, and you feel that you love and trust him, marry him. You were so young that perhaps he thought it better to leave you until you were older. Doubtless he had good reasons. It might be well to accept the position in a distant state, just to give yourself a chance to think things over fairly. You are too near now to get a clear perspective. Tell him to come to you at the end of six months or a year, and you'll give him his answer then.

SOPHIA, Missouri.—I didn't think that Missouri girls were ever so stupid. Don't you know that you shouldn't write to a strange man whom you met on the train, just because he was pleased with your appearance and asked you to write. In the first place you shouldn't have talked to him. It isn't safe. All girls, remember this.

MISS B. J., Wisconsin.—Just how much of your letter am I to believe? You say you live on a large farm (I believe that), a saloon in connection with this (interest) and that you do the housework and tend bar, also attend choir practice twice a week. Some combination—bar maid and choir singer. What do you sell over your bar? I won't tell Mr. Volstead. Has my previous advice helped you? I'm sorry, but I don't live in Chicago so you can't visit me next time you are in Chicago. I'd like to meet a girl like you.

N. D., Oklahoma.—You are acting in a very childish manner, unless you have good reasons for disliking your friend's husband. You couldn't expect her to be with you as much as before her marriage, but you could still be friends, and I think you owe her an apology. Maybe she is a like-me-like-my-husband sort of person, and if you can't visit her home when he is at home she may not care to have you when he is absent. Some wives are like that. You know your reasons for all this, so can best determine whether you did right or wrong.

TROUBLED, Star Route.—Have a frank talk with your husband and tell him to choose between you and his people, since they are not financially dependent upon him. Tell him you are going away and that he can join you when he is willing to live with you in a home of your own.

WEARIED BLUE EYES, Tennessee.—If you deliberately "beat her time," as you express it, why be hypocritical enough to say you "have a heart" and that you feel sorry for her. You should have considered her feelings earlier. However, don't worry any more about it or feel that you wronged the girl. Maybe you did, but she should thank you for it. You have no assurance that a prettier girl will not take him from you, since he seems to be of a weak sort.

UNDECIDED BRUNETTE, Pa.—Tell your father and mother that if they'll send you to high school you'll promise to study hard and not waste your time with boys. An education will be worth more to you than anything else and there will always be boys when there won't be an opportunity for an education. That's what I'd want you to do if you were my own little daughter and getting such good rank in your studies. I'd be very proud of you.

Mildred, Wisc.—If you've always read my Talks with Girls, you must have seen where I said that all leading hospitals required applicants for nursing to have a high school education or its equivalent. Select your hospital with care, for three years means a lot and you want to get the most value for your work and the time spent. Don't select a hospital because it has a reputation for being easy—if any of them are that. The harder you are obliged to work and study the better nurse you'll be when you graduate.

Sincerely,
COUSIN MARION.

ABDINGTON, Otter Point Road, MARYLAND.

DEAR SISTERS:

I would like very much to receive letters from any of the sisters who care to write. Will answer all who send stamps and as many as I can of those who do not.

I live on a thirty-eight acre farm in Harford County, and, having lived all my life in a busy city, find it very lonely. My nearest neighbor is over a mile away. I have two children but they are quite small.

With love to all, MRS. JOHN C. SCHWEITZER.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

To remove ink stains from colored goods, take equal parts of cream of tartar and alum, moisten enough to make a paste. Spread over stain and wash in usual way. This will not injure color or fabric.—MRS. F. C. WARKENTON, Winton, Calif.

If expectant mothers will rub dark spots on face with pure olive oil they will disappear.—RENA J. VAWTER, Oakley, Kans.

It is better to keep your coffee, cereals, sugar, spices, etc., in fruit jars with screw tops, rather than in paper boxes.—MRS. D. E. DUBBS, Vesta, Minn.

To remove iodine stains from white goods, stretch the fabric over bowl and pour boiling water through it. Do this as soon as possible after stain has gotten on goods. Then wash in usual way.—MRS. THOMAS PHILLIPS, Ladysmith, Wisc.

Make children's underwaists to slip over their heads. This saves buttons and buttonholes in the back.

Don't throw away old sweater sleeves. Make leggings for baby from them.

Make shoes for baby from old pieces of velvet. They are warm and look nice.—BROWN EYES, Corinth, Miss.

If boiled custard curdles pour it into another dish and beat with egg beater until smooth.

Sweet Grass Basket

For Your Sewing And Fancy Work

WHERE is the woman who does not "just love" these beautiful Sewing Baskets made of sweet grass? Their delightful fragrance which is practically everlasting is like that of flowers; they are handsome in appearance and very strong and serviceable, being hand-woven by the St. Regis Indians of Canada, who produce the finest hand-made baskets in the world.

Of ample size—eight inches in diameter and three inches deep—and with its close-fitting top, this sweet-grass Basket is just what you need in which to take along your sewing or fancy work when calling or visiting. And at home it holds your work, along with scissors, buttons, thread and other necessities, so that you always know just where to look for them. And the Basket itself is such a beautiful ornament for any room.

The Indians sell these Baskets for $2.00 and $3.00 apiece at summer resorts, but by buying in large quantities they let us have them at a special low price. Therefore, we are able to offer the Basket herewith illustrated and described for a very small club of subscriptions as you will note by reading the following bargain offer.

Given To You! For only four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each we will send you this fragrant, sweet-grass Sewing Basket free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 8084.

Comfort's Home Lawyer

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MRS. A. L. M., Kansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child nor descendant, his whole estate, after payment of debts and expenses, would go to his surviving widow.

COMFORT READER, Pennsylvania.—We are of the opinion that the remarriage, during the lifetime of the husband or wife, of any married person would be a bigamous and illegal marriage under the laws of any state of the Union, unless, of course, such person had a valid divorce from such former husband or wife.

MRS. I. G., Minnesota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child nor descendant, his whole estate, after payment of debts and expenses, would descend to his surviving widow.

MRS. E. A., Wisconsin.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the cemetery lot you mention belongs to the man who purchased and paid for same, and it will be necessary for you to purchase same from him or his estate, in case he is dead, if you desire to acquire good title to the same.

N. T. K., Wyoming.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the land you mention stands in the husband's name, and is occupied by the family as a homestead, the husband cannot dispose of same without the signature of the wife to the deed of conveyance; we think that upon his death, without a will, the widow, if she survives him and he leaves also children, would, in addition to her homestead rights and certain other small allowances, be entitled to receive one-half of his estate, after payment of debts and expenses, the balance of the estate going in equal shares to his children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share.

L. W., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the woman you mention can dispose of such interest, in the property you mention, as is vested in her, but we can form no opinion as to the amount of this interest without an examination of the will through which she derives her title.

MRS. E. R. J., Georgia.—If, as we understand from your communication, your parents' interest in the property you mention was limited to a life estate, we think it would die with them and that such property would not descend as an asset of either of their estates; we think an examination of the instrument, under which they derive their life estate, would be necessary to determine where the remainder interest in the property is vested.

MRS. F. B., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving a surviving widow and more than one child, his widow, in addition to certain allowances, would receive one-third of his estate, after payments of debts and expenses; we think it is necessary for the widow to survive him in order to become vested with her share in the property, except that he is liable for her support during his lifetime, unless she abandons him without good cause.

H. J. W., Maine.—We think you can foreclose your mortgage as soon as there is a default in the payment of either principle or interest as provided in the terms thereof.

C. F. P., North Carolina.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that the statute of limitations runs against actions brought for the foreclosure of a mortgage within 10 years, unless such mortgage has been kept alive by payments of interest or principal or some other evidence of indebtedness.

F. N., Minnesota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the mortgage upon your property is properly recorded it will remain a prior lien upon the property until same is paid, and that you cannot have same subordinate to a later mortgage without the consent of the holder thereof.

MRS. J. S., South Dakota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the holder of the mortgage you mention can collect any deficiency due him from any property the mortgagor may own, not exempt by law under any execution.

MISS V. E. S., Tennessee.—We do not think you can now set aside the deed of the property you mention if the same was executed and delivered by your father in 1881; we think an examination of the records of the county in the state where the property is situated would be necessary to determine where the title to the property is now vested.

MRS. D. G., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child nor descendant, his surviving widow, in addition to certain allowances, is entitled, after payment of debts and expenses, to receive one-half of the real estate and the whole of the personal estate, absolutely, the balance of the real estate going to his parents, brothers and sisters or their descendants, depending upon who is left.

MRS. L. M., Michigan.—Under the laws of your state, we do not think the consent of the wife is necessary for the sale of the livestock belonging to the husband.

M. M. J., Ohio.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and having no child nor descendant, his surviving widow would receive all of his estate, after payment of debts and expenses, provided same consisted only of property acquired by him, and none of which came to him by descent, devise or deed of gift.

MRS. G. H., Iowa.—We think the woman whose husband beats her should make her complaint against him to a justice of the peace or some local magistrate, so that he may be punished for his offence.

MRS. J. A. H., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no child nor descendant and leaving no will, the widow, after payment of debts and expenses, is entitled to receive absolutely all personal property which came to the husband in right of the marriage, and also one-half of the real and personal estate of which the husband was owner at the time of his death, provided she makes a written election to take such property subject to the payment of the husband's debts, but this election must be in writing, acknowledged as in the case of a deed, filed in the probate court within six months, and recorded in the county where letters of administration was granted within nine months after the grant of such letters.

MRS. T. K., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all property both real and personal owned or claimed by the husband before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, devise or descent, and also the increase of all such real estate, is the separate property of the husband, and forms no part of the community property of his marriage.

M. E. F., North Carolina.—If the contract of sale signed by you is in proper form, we think the purchaser under such contract can compel you to carry out the provisions of such contract.

MRS. S. J., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a married man is liable for the support of his wife, unless she abandons him without good cause, or unless her conduct is such as to justify him in leaving her, or unless she has sufficient means to provide for her own support.

M. H. J., North Dakota.—Under the laws of your state, we think women attain their majority at 18 years.

MRS. D. W., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the widow of the man who died can convey no greater interest in the property, she received under his will, than she herself possesses therein, and if she is limited to an estate to be terminated upon her death or remarriage, her deed to the property would only convey such an estate, and the purchaser's right in the property would expire upon her death or remarriage; we think the signature of those entitled to the remainder interest in the property would be necessary to convey absolute titles.

Diana, I like Charlie Chaplin just as much as you do. I never miss seeing a picture in which he appears and I believe that much of his work will become screen classics. I hope you saw him in "Easy Street." Charlie is in New York at this writing, staying at the Ritz Carlton hotel, and the other night a worshiping crowd almost crushed him to death in signifying their admiration.

Send me a copy of the "Hawaii Herald," Diana, and tell us about Oahu, Kauai and Maui—and about how good ripe pineapples and bananas taste!

ST. MARIES, BOX 385, IDAHO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

As I have nothing else to do I will take my pencil in hand and write to you. The last time I wrote it was to Uncle Charlie but I guess you will have to answer the purpose at present. I am a young man eighteen years of age. I work every day. Last fall I was getting from $5.50 to $7.50 per day, but now I, and everybody else, is getting $3.60 to $4.00. Uncle, what is going to come next? But I am not so bad off: I own a five-room house and lot and an acre of orchard here in Idaho which I bought with money I saved up. I think I will buy a car—or rather an automobile. Uncle, do you think this is a good thing to do, or would it be a big expense? Maybe you know; I think you have had one. If I buy one, I am going to Lodi, California, where one of the COMFORT cousins is living. I correspond with her and her name is Alvina Zieman. She joined the League of Cousins about two years ago—at the time I did and I am proud of it, too, as every cousin ought to be. I would like to hear from any of the cousins and would also like a favor from one of them. I would like the words of the songs, "Three Leaves of Shamrock," and "The Gypsy's Warning." I will return any favor that is possible. Uncle, do you think we are going to have a harder time this year than last year?

I quite agree with Augustus Trick, but as far as the girls using powder puffs, that is their business and not the boys'. They do not interfere with the boys' doings. The powder is not any worse for them than it is for the boys to smoke cigarettes. But let me tell you and all others that there are some mighty good girls behind that powder and paint. And some mighty poor ones. I don't believe that Gus really knew what he was saying when he handed so many good girls such a wallop. I know a few good ones both at a distance and close up, too. Well, Uncle, I'll close my letter as it is getting most too long and I am anxious to see it published. I want Augustus and the other cousins to see it—especially a certain one. So don't let Billy the Goat get this until after it has been in COMFORT. Good by, with best wishes from

A COMFORT Cousin, ARCHIE GILLARD.

Archie, you want to know what is going to come next? This is a large order for any prophet and I would rather have the contract landed on Billy—who is always ready to make dogmatic assertions and predictions, without regard for facts or for the feelings of his audience. But I imagine all your question means is how many less silvery salary cartwheels you may be going to receive six months from now at the rate your rich wage scale has been descending. Well, Archibald, old chap, what I've seen of you so far I like, and I hope you won't be getting one red Indian less, but the chances look bad to me just now. It is going to be a difficult year for wage-earners—in the big cities at least, where prices of rent and foodstuffs are still high enough to take too large chunks out of depleted pay envelopes, or to be paid from past savings of workers who have lost their jobs. The unemployment situation in New York City is a desperate one. Over half a million men are out of work and are swamping the various aid organizations which are attempting to care for these industrial derelicts. There is nothing which is more of an indictment of modern life than the fact that an able-bodied man, willing to work, can be forced to go without food or shelter that he is capable of earning, and, jobless and helpless, must take the aid which can be only sparingly doled out by charitable organizations. For labor is wealth, and the more men who are working, the more wealth is being produced and the happier and better off we can all be. A hungry man, sleeping on a park bench, is a liability, not an asset, to society. He is a living problem for civilization. He is a sore showing the unhealthy circulation of our nation's industrial blood. As a part of the present problem, as a penalty we cannot avoid, is the fact that we must all face the assumption of a lower standard of living—which means lower wages—until the immense destruction of wealth which the great war brought on has been mostly made up. It cannot fail that the brunt of this "making up" must fall upon labor—the creating spirit of all wealth which exists or can exist. Yet, with all this gloomy prospect, think, Archie, what a lucky exhibit you are for wage-earners of other struggling countries: At eighteen you have a house, lot and orchard purchased with money saved from your labor, and now you are even contemplating the purchase of a gasolene chariot, once considered only as a plaything of the idle rich. As to the financial policy involved in buying an automobile, Archie, it depends entirely upon capital and earning capacity of the prospective buyer. Personally, I do not think a man earning four dollars a day should own a car. You earn your money with too much difficulty to have it wasted in the constant consumption of gasolene, oil and tires which goes on each day a car is used. Autos have dropped heavily in price and many good low-cost cars are on the market, but as you would be using your car only for pleasure purposes, I think you would be wise to leave even the low-priced cars alone and seek your fun in ways costing less money. Archibald, there are railroads running to Lodi, California, and you do not have to own an automobile just "to get to see" cousin Alvina Zieman. Buy a ticket, Archie, and keep the rest of your change in your inside pocket until you get to Lodi.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for April

"Inasmuch as you have done it unto the least of these you have done it unto Me."

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Every month brings to me many letters which disregard this simple and necessary rule. Appeals unaccompanied by the references required will be destroyed.

Leonard Norman, Murdock, R. R. 1, Box 43, Minn. A young man unable to support himself because of a tubercular foot. Well recommended. Send him cheer and a shower of dimes. J. Ashburn, Taylorsville, N. C. Helpless and with a wife and four children to support. Give him a generous helping hand in his troubles. Mrs. Bertha C. Smith, Portland, 168 Ivy Street, Ore. A widow and a shut-in. Weary of four walls and begs for "a little real human sympathy." Send her letters and cheer which will help her to carry on. Mrs. Minnie Hughes, Shenandoah, 1208 W. Sheridan Avenue, Iowa. A widow who has reached a hard pass in trying to support herself and her young children. Show her that her hard struggle is worthy of reward. Mrs. Bertha Mulliner, Grand Junction, 860 Struthers Street, Colorado. Spinal trouble and a long chain of other physical ills make this poor woman ask aid for herself and her two children's support. The Remarkable Story of "Eva Dean"

NOTE—This is a story of "Eva Dean." In its brief way it presents the story of hundreds of other women who, in the fascinating manner described, have been able to provide themselves with the extra money which slender incomes so often cannot afford. If it shall have shown the way to happiness to but ONE woman, instead of hundreds who will respond, it will have served its purpose.

How One Woman Solved the Money Problem

Was this Eva Dean? I could scarcely believe my eyes. A miracle had happened in only a few short months. The prosperous looking, handsomely gowned woman before me was indeed my friend, Eva Dean. But what a transformation!

I knew that she had been very hard up and with only her husband's limited earnings on which to depend. Then, too, I had heard about some serious financial trouble the Deans had while I was away. Yet, here she was, at a time when work was scarce and wages getting lower and lower, well dressed, happy as a lark, and with a smile of contentment on a face which showed not a trace of the hardship I knew she had endured.

She must have read the question in my eyes and, as we entered her beautifully furnished home, she had told me the whole story.

"This is it," she said with pride, "the Gearhart Knitter which has helped me out of my trouble and made me one of the happiest women on earth. Every day I devote a little of my time to knitting the Famous Allwear Standard Hosiery.

You know my circumstances a few months back. I was almost desperate. I thought of sewing, washing, working out,—anything to overcome that terrible need for money. Finally I learned that the Gearhart Company of Clearfield, Pa., wanted women to do machine knitting at home. They said the work was easy and that they would pay me generously for every pair of standard Allwear Hosiery I could send them. They offered me a three year contract and as I found them to be a very reliable, long established company with bank references and hundreds of satisfied home workers, I promptly decided to send the moderate amount required to secure the knitter and start in making money.

It has proved a really delightful and restful occupation for me. It has turned my spare moments into golden hours. You see for yourself what I have gained, happiness at home, new clothes, things for the children, and money in the bank.

The Gearhart Knitter and the wool to make the hosiery came together and I got busy right away,—nothing difficult about it, no special training necessary,—so easy in fact that my husband and the children often help me.

Let me tell you, those checks from the Gearhart people came in mighty handy. One after another they arrived, as fast as I could send them the beautiful knitted Allwear" Hosiery."

The story of Eva Dean was finished and then I was treated to the surprise of my life. With a few simple movements she had the Gearhart Knitter started and at the bottom there appeared a lovely knitted sock of wonderful quality.

No wonder the Gearhart Knitter is known as the standard knitter, the fastest, most complete and reliable knitter made! No wonder the Gearhart home industry has so many happy, contented women!

My heart goes out to the woman struggling to make ends meet and to her I say, "Write to the Gearhart Knitting Machine Company of Clearfield, Pa., right away. Get a Gearhart Knitter, time for and accept the liberal pay time for and accept the liberal pay checks which they will send you for the pleasantest, nicest home work imaginable."

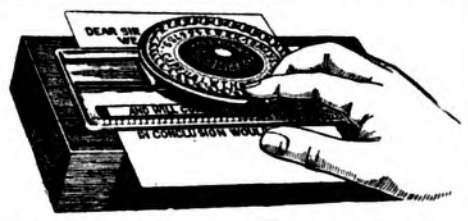
Reward No. 9882

Full Opera Length



THE dream of every woman and girl is to possess her own necklace of gleaming, iridescent pearls. There's a wonderful fascination about them—a beauty that appeals to every feminine heart.

Now your dream can come true—for we are giving away this handsome, full opera length rope of Parisian pearls. It is 54 inches long, all the pearls are of uniform size—¼ inch in diameter—of perfect finish and luster, far handsomer than the ordinary imitation pearl necklace sold at a high price. It can easily be wound twice around the neck, making the double rope as shown in our illustration.

By rare good luck we secured first choice of these necklaces from a large importer and at a price that enables us to give them for an unusually small club. Please read the following offer and learn how you can get a beautiful, 54-inch rope of pearls free of all cost.

Given To You! For only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each, we will send you this handsome, opera length Pearl Necklace free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 9882.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

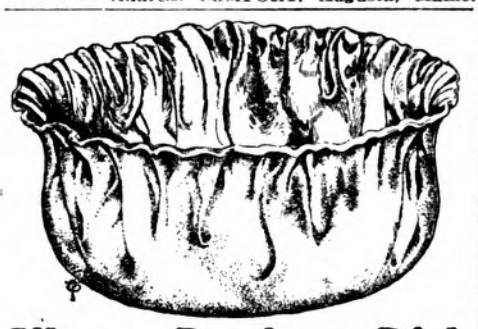

Little Giant Typewriter

A REAL machine that writes very distinctly. Has every letter in the alphabet, all the numerals from 1 to 10 and punctuation marks. Uses any size letter paper up to 5 inches wide. For correspondence, making out invoices, statements, addressing envelopes, etc., this machine will do the work well. It is very easy to operate, in fact, a child can write on it after a little practice.

Given To You! For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this Typewriter free and prepaid. Reward No. 8853.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Silver Bonbon Dish

THIS beautiful dish can be used for a variety of purposes—for candy, nuts, salted peanuts, popcorn, etc. It is much larger than it appears in the above illustration, measuring over five inches in width and two inches deep. It is heavily silver plated outside and gold lined. Needless to say, it makes a handsome ornament for the sideboard and will last a lifetime.

Plant This Grand Fruit Orchard!

For A Club Of Only Two We Will Send You Seventeen Apple And Pear Tree Grafts, Berry Bushes And Grape Vines!

LAST season we sent out nearly twenty-five thousand of these Orchard Collections to COMFORT readers. So far as we know, not one of them failed to grow. This season we expect to give away fifty thousand. We buy these Collections from a nursery man who has been in business for years and who has the reputation of producing some of the finest nursery stock to be obtained anywhere. He personally selects the different varieties that make up these Collections and forwards them direct to our readers by prepaid parcel post. He Guarantees Every Collection. If any of the trees, bushes or vines fail to grow satisfactorily they will be replaced for you free of all charge.

Here Is What You Get!

ONE Snow Apple Tree, One Wealthy Apple Tree, One Kieffer Pear Tree, One Bartlett Pear Tree, Two Lucretia Dewberry Bushes, Two Rex Raspberry Bushes, Three Niagara Grape Vines, Three Delaware Grape Vines, Three Concord Grape Vines.

The four Apple and Pear Tree grafts are one foot high, grafted from bearing trees with good records. They will take root as soon as planted and grow rapidly into vigorous, healthy trees.

The nine Grape Vines are a product of Southern Michigan, where the finest grapes in the world are grown. From selected vines, cuttings are taken and buried in underground pits until they undergo a process known as "callousing." After being properly "calloused" the cuttings will take root as soon as planted. The "calloused" Grape Cuttings in this Collection are all produced in this manner. They will grow rapidly and bear immense crops of choice grapes almost as soon as large vines planted at the same time.

The two Raspberry Bushes and two Dewberry Bushes are robust, one-year-old youngsters, ready to set out as soon as you receive them. They will begin growing at once and develop into fine, heavy-bearing bushes if given proper attention.

All Will Bear Soon!

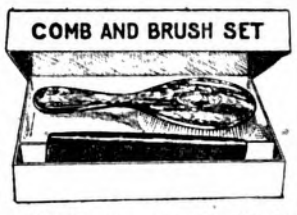
This Fine Fruit Orchard will prove an ever-increasing source of pleasure and profit to you year after year. All the trees, vines and bushes will bear fruit in a remarkably short time. In two years the Raspberry and Dewberry bushes will commence bearing. The following year you will have grapes. The Apple and Pear Trees will begin to bear in from three to five years. Then you will have loads and loads of fine fruit in increasing quantity every year.

Full Planting Instructions!

WITH this Orchard Collection you will also receive instructions for planting. These directions are illustrated with pictures and diagrams showing you just what to do and when and how to do it. By following these simple directions you should in a few years have one of the finest orchards in your neighborhood.

They Are Sure To Grow!

REMEMBER, everything in this Collection is absolutely guaranteed to grow. We stand behind every Collection sent out and the grower in turn stands behind us. You may rest assured that this splendid Collection will reach you in good condition and grow to your entire satisfaction if the directions for planting are carefully followed. If any of the trees, bushes or vines fail to make growth satisfactory to you, we hereby guarantee to replace them absolutely without charge. You run absolutely no risk in accepting this offer.



Our Free Offer!

FOR a club of only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will give you this remarkable Fruit and Orchard Collection free—the two Apple Trees, two Pear Trees, two Dewberry Bushes, two Raspberry Bushes and nine Grape Vines. The whole Collection will be carefully wrapped and sent to you prepaid by parcel post, direct from the grower at the proper time for planting in your locality. Remember we guarantee that everything will reach you in perfect condition. Be sure to send in your order this very day and ask for Reward No. 9542.

"Peggy"

The New Winter Doll

PEGGY first saw the light of day in New York but she didn't like the big city with its noise and confusion and was mighty glad to come to Maine on a brief vacation before looking for a permanent home somewhere in the country.

She doesn't care where she lives so long as it is in some cozy little town or on a nice, big farm, and provided she can find some little girl who will be a kind mother to her. She just loves the horses and cows and doggies and kitties and—yes, even the little "piggies" make her laugh until she can hardly stand up.

Peggy says that life on the farm is the only life for her, so we want to give her to some little girl who lives on a farm, where she can romp and play to her heart's content and be happy all day long. Please remember, however, that we have but a limited number of these Dolls on hand and if you want one your order should be sent in at once.

A New York manufacturer who wanted to keep his help busy during the dull season sold us these Dolls at about one-half the regular wholesale price, so we are enabled to give them away for almost nothing.

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you "Peggy" free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8621.

Writing And Drawing Outfit

Reward No. 9972

For Home And School

In A Fine Leathereett Case

HERE is something that is needed in every home and by every schoolboy and schoolgirl—a big value-assortment of almost everything needed for writing and drawing. Our illustration is, of course, greatly reduced in size. The Case, which is made of fine leatherette, is 10½ inches long and 2½ inches wide. It is of the folding style, with a snap fastener, so that it can conveniently be carried in the pocket or in the children's lunch basket. Inside the Case there are three high-grade pencils with erasers, one good quality penholder with pen, one twin pencil (in reality two pencils in a combination holder), one pencil sharpener, one large rubber eraser, one 10-inch ruler and an aluminum collapsible drinking cup with cover.

This Outfit is manufactured by the American Lead Pencil Company, which is sufficient guarantee of its fine quality, and we know that it will please our readers, especially those who have children going to school, and of course it is just as handy in the home, because all the pencils, penholder, etc., are high grade and just what grown people like to use. If you will accept the following special offer we will send you one of these fine Outfits free.

Given To You! For only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each, we will send you this complete Writing and Drawing Outfit, exactly as above described, free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 9972.

VETERINARY INFORMATION

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

Worm Medicine for Pigs

WHEN pigs that are well fed fail to thrive, have harsh, "staring" coats of hair, "pot bellies," depraved appetite and a tendency to diarrhea, worms are usually the cause. Intestinal parasites may also cause fits. It is best, so far as possible, to prevent pigs from becoming infested with worms. This may be managed by ridding sows of parasites as soon as their pigs are strong enough to run outdoors and then allowing the sow and her litter a clean colony house and a succession of fresh, green grazing crops from early spring until late autumn. Such crops may consist of clover, alfalfa, soy beans, rape, peas and oats or any other green food relished by swine and suitable for growth in the district where the pigs are raised. It is also necessary to keep the young pigs out of houses, yards, fields and wallows used by adult hogs and at all times to provide pure drinking water and to keep the feeding utensils scrupulously clean.

When pigs are known to be infested with worms withold feed for 18 hours or more and then give the following medicines, in a very little slop or water, for each 50 pounds of body weight of pigs: Two and one-half grains each of santonin and calomel; one dram of freshly powdered areca nut, and one-half dram of bicarbonate of soda. Repeat the treatment in two weeks. It is a mistake to give concentrated lye to hogs and copperas (sulphate of copper) is liable to cause a pregnant sow to abort. When such a sow needs worm medicine she may safely be given one or two teaspoonfuls of flowers of sulphur, according to age and size, in feed for three consecutive days, for two weeks. As santonin is expensive, some breeders prefer to give turpentine in slop or milk. Pure medicinal turpentine should be used. The dose is one teaspoonful for each 80 pounds of body weight of pig, to be given in slop once daily for three days a week, for two weeks. Commercial worm capsules are also effective but may cause choking or gangrene unless very carefully administered.

MOON BLINDNESS.—Both of my horses have had sore eyes and now there is a white scum forming over the sight of the eye. Is there any remedy that will remove the scum and restore the sight? H. F. L.

A.—The disease present is periodic or recurrent ophthalmia, commonly called "moon blindness." It is practically incurable and after repeated attacks causes cataract and blindness of one or both eyes. Tendency to the disease is considered hereditary but many consider the disease to be caused by germs. Veterinarians are now experimenting with a bacterin against the disease. Blindness may be retarded somewhat by isolating the mare in a practically darkened stable, giving her one dram of iodide of potash twice daily in drinking water for a week or 10 days at time of attack and twice daily putting a little bit of one per cent. yellow oxid of mercury ointment in the inner corner of the affected eye and also smearing some on the eyelid. Bathe the eye with a saturated solution of beric acid frequently at time of attack.

RINGBONE.—Can you tell me what causes my two-year-old horse to be so lame in his right front leg? Some tell me it is ringbone. Is there a cure for it? A. H.

A.—A personal examination is of course necessary for the determination of the seat and cause of a mysterious lameness. If you are sure that a ringbone is causing the lameness, the only certain way of giving relief would be to have high unnerving done by a trained veterinarian. Point-firing and blistering followed by a prolonged rest may suffice when a hind pastern is the seat of the ringbone, but it rarely helps the condition on a fore pastern. If you cannot employ a veterinarian clip off the hair and repeatedly blister the ringbone and hoof-head.

PRECOCIOUS LACTATION.—I have a heifer, two years old, that will be fresh in the summer. There is a six-months-old calf sucking her and she gives lots of milk. Will this hurt her? J. W. W.

A.—When calves suck the teats of a heifer that has not had a calf, milk commonly forms and the tendency, as a result, is for the udder to become ruinously affected with garget at freshening time. The calf should be weaned at once and the milk secretion of the heifer gradually dried off by increasing the intervals between milkings, rubbing in warm camphorated oil or lard twice daily and feeding a dry ration.

DISEASE OF SWINE.—Will you tell me what is the matter with my hogs? They were in good shape the first of last November, and all at once they stopped eating corn, but would drink water or slop, until the day before they died. Some of them are down in the back and some have swollen joints. They have blisters and sores on them and finally the hair drops off. I feed mostly corn, some skim-milk, buttermilk and slop. They haven't had much green stuff since the last of October. I keep wood ashes in their pens. MRS. A. M. T.

A.—The hogs, no doubt, are dying of cholera or swine plague or necrotic stomachitis. You should at once have a qualified veterinarian make the necessary investigation and post-mortem examination to determine what is wrong. Vaccination will be in order as a preventive if it is cholera or swine plague, and new, clean quarters should be provided if it is the other disease. Medicinal treatment rarely does any good.

LAMPAS.—I have a six-year-old horse that I bought a year ago. He had the "lampers" or what people said were lampers. His upper gums are swollen and he can hardly bite corn off the cob. Please tell me what to do for it and what causes it. H. E. H.

A. Lampas is not a disease but merely a swollen condition of the bars of the hard palate just behind the upper incisor teeth. It usually comes in sympathy with swelling of the gums and cheeks or tongue, caused by sharp or irregular molar teeth or by teething. Have the teeth put in order by a veterinarian, and if then necessary paint the swelling with tincture of iodin twice a week, but do not cut or burn the part.

WEAK STIFLE.—I have a colt, 18 months old, that is stifled. The stifle flies out when he trots but not when he walks. I would like to know what I can do for him. MRS. H. E. D.

A.—The patella or kneecap of the stifle joint at the flank slips out of place. This is due to weakness of the ligaments and muscles of the joint. To remedy the condition, tie the colt up short in a narrow stall, and from a collar around his neck run a padded rope or strap between the forelegs and tie it to a strap buckled around the pastern of the affected leg to keep that foot somewhat advanced. A high-heeled shoe also helps. Clip the hair from the stifle joint and around it and apply a blister when the colt has been tied up. Repeat the blister when the skin has recovered. Obtain the blister from a veterinarian.

KICKING IN STABLE.—I have a mare eight years old that has the habit of kicking the partition with her left hind foot. She does it more at night than in the daytime. Can you tell me what I can do to stop it? J. A. McK.

A.—Rats or mice in the stable often cause a nervous horse to kick at night. Do away with that cause. She may not kick if you can allow her a box-stall at night. If she persists, buckle a piece of trace-chain to the pastern of the leg with which she does the kicking.

INFECTED EYES.—My boys have a pet dog and there is something wrong with his eyes. A formation gathers around them and they appear to itch, for he scratches all the time and his hair comes out. What is good for him? I have taken COMFORT seventeen years. MRS. B.

A.—Bathe the eye twice daily with warm water containing all the boric acid it will dissolve. If that does not suffice and there is a discharge from the eyes, put a drop or so of 25 per cent. argyrol solution in each eye at intervals of six hours, or oftener if necessary, until the discharge subsides. If there are sores on the skin, clip off the hair, scrub clean and then rub in some compound sulphur ointment every three days.

WORMS IN CAT.—Will you prescribe something for my cat? After taking the kittens away from her, her bowels became very loose and the membrane in the corner of the eye is nearly half out of the eye. MRS. N. D. S.

A.—We suspect that intestinal worms are causing the irritation. Possibly you can find them in the dropping. They may be destroyed by withholding food for 24 hours and then giving the cat one to three grains of santonin, according to age and size, and following in an hour with a dose of castor oil in milk. A very large cat may also have five drops of turpentine added to the dose of oil. Repeat the treatment in two weeks. Diarrhea in cats may be stopped by giving a dose of castoria and then five to 10 grains of subnitrate of bismuth in milk two or three times daily.

FITS.—Will you tell me what ails my eight-weeks-old pigs? They look all right, but when they eat or drink they sometimes fall and have spasms or fits. Is it worms? MRS. F. I. B.

A.—Too fast drinking of milk or slops by hungry pigs sometimes induces spasm of the gullet which results in fit. Indigestion is usually present in such cases. Worms are not the likely cause. Feed slop that will just pour and allow milk twice daily in addition. Do not feed oats or unscreened ground oats and do not cook the feed. Have the pigs take active outdoor exercise every day. If constipated, physic the pigs with castor oil or epsom salt.

According to recent figures, there are 9,245,195 passenger cars, trucks and commercial motor vehicles registered in the United States.

Gate Top Mesh Purse

THIS is the new "Gate Top" mesh purse with a ten-inch wrist chain, handsome, stylish, and perfectly safe for the carrying of money and other valuables. A slight pull with the forefinger of each hand instantly opens the purse, a gentle pressure with thumb and finger closes it. Our illustration shows the purse closed. When open the top is as large as the bottom, or in other words, two inches in diameter. When closed it leaves an opening only three-fourths of an inch wide over which the brightly polished German silver cover snaps down tightly so that the contents of the purse cannot possibly become lost. This dainty purse is now extremely fashionable so we have purchased a quantity for the benefit of those of our lady and girl readers who like to be up-to-date in these little accessories. You can have one of them free by taking advantage of the following

Send Only Three Subscriptions For This Cut Glass Sugar and Creamer—Or Two Subscriptions For The Pickle Dish Or Spoon Tray!

WE want to ask our women readers—did you ever see or hear of a more remarkable offer?

Just think of the small number of subscriptions required to earn any one or all of these beautiful cut glass pieces.

And it is real cut glass—of good weight and thickness—clear, brilliant, crystal glass, exquisitely hand cut in a new and beautiful design. Each piece is full size with the same handsome floral pattern that twines completely around the outside in graceful curves, while on the bottom of each piece is a heavily cut, many-pointed star. The rim of both sugar and creamer is deeply notched.

Do you wonder how we can make this offer? A certain factory, realizing that we shall probably use thousands of these sets, has made us an unusually low price. That's the whole story. And the result is we can give you your choice of this rich genuine cut glass absolutely free in return for the easiest half hour's work you ever did.

We Prepay Charges And Positively Guarantee Safe Delivery

Any or all of these pieces can be safely mailed by parcel post. We pay all postage and guarantee safe delivery to your home. If by chance a piece should become broken (something that rarely happens) we will replace it free of charge.

We know that every woman that receives one or more of these rich cut glass pieces will be amazed and delighted with the bargain she has obtained. It is easily the greatest value in a premium that we have ever been able to offer. We will give you your choice of the Sugar and Creamer, or the Pickle Dish, or the Spoon Tray absolutely free on the terms of the following special

Club Offers. For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you the Sugar and Creamer by prepaid insured parcel post. (Reward No. 8883). Or for two one-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you your choice of either the Pickle Dish (Reward No. 9402), or the Spoon Tray (Reward No. 9412). Or we will send you the complete set of all four pieces free and prepaid for a club of seven one-year subscriptions at 50 cents each. (Reward No. 7457).

Crooked Spines Made Straight

If you are suffering from any form of spinal trouble you can be relieved—and probably wholly overcome your affliction—right in your own home without pain or discomfort. A wonderful anatomical appliance has been invented by a man who cured himself of Spinal Curvature. Its results are marvelous. It is nature's own method. Eminent physicians are endorsing it. The Philo Burt Method relieves the pressure at the affected parts of the spine, the whole spine is invigorated and strengthened, all soreness is taken out of the back, the cartilage between the vertibræ is made to expand, the contracted muscles are relaxed, and the spine is straightened. There is bright hope for you, no matter how long you have suffered. We have strong testimonials from every State in the Union. Each appliance is made to order from individual measurements and fits perfectly. There is positively no inconvenience in wearing. We guarantee satisfaction and let you use it 30 days. Write today for our new book. It gives full information and testimonials.

Gold Birthstone Rings

THE most popular ladies' rings worn today are these beautiful birthstone rings. Not only is it considered lucky to wear one of them but they are now and always will be exceedingly stylish. We are able to illustrate only three of the rings but there are twelve in all—a different stone for each month of the year, and of course you should wear the stone that is symbolical of the month you were born. The following is a list of the twelve rings, names of the stones and the month to which they apply:

No. 8411, January, Garnet. No. 8421, February, Amethyst. No. 8431, March, Bloodstone. No. 8441, April, Diamond. No. 8451, May, Emerald. No. 8461, June, Agate. No. 8471, July, Ruby. No. 8481, August, Sardonyx. No. 8491, September, Sapphire. No. 8501, October, Opal. No. 8511, November, Topaz. No. 8521, December, Turquoise.

Each ring is guaranteed genuine gold filled, which looks exactly like solid gold and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The rings themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are solitaires and perfect imitations of the real gems. The setting of each ring is the ever popular "Tiffany" style. As a Christmas, Birthday or all-the-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister, nothing could be more appropriate and acceptable than one of these beautiful guaranteed rings set with the birthstone of the person to whom it is given. We will send you one of these rings free upon the terms of the following offer:

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you one of these beautiful gold-filled Rings by parcel post, prepaid. Please be sure to give size and number of ring wanted.

SELF-FILLING

Fountain Pen

For A Club Of Three

HERE is a fountain pen that we can positively guarantee. Perhaps you have had some experience with fountain pens which never would write well and continually leaked ink all over your fingers. If so you will certainly appreciate this opportunity to secure a fountain pen that has none of these defects. Our illustration is of course greatly reduced in size. The pen offered you here is 6½ inches long, made entirely of hard rubber, finely finished, and the pen point is genuine 14-K gold. The feeding device is perfect, permitting a uniform flow of ink and it will not leak. Also please notice that this is a self-filling pen. You can fill this fountain pen in less than 10 seconds by pressing down the spring on the side, then placing the pen point in a bottle of ink, after which you release the spring and the pen is instantly filled with ink to its full capacity. If given proper care this pen should last anybody for years. If you will accept the following special offer we will send you one of these self-filling fountain pens with a positive guarantee that if it fails to prove satisfactory in any way you may return it to us and we will replace it with a new pen free of charge.

Club Offer. For a club of only three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this guaranteed self-filling fountain pen free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8873.

Five One-Year Old

ROSE BUSHES

HERE is the offer you have been waiting for—our new 1922 offer of beautiful Rose bushes free to all COMFORT readers. This year we shall give you what we believe to be five of the finest varieties yet produced. They come from the most famous rose grower in the United States—an expert who has done nothing but cutivate roses all his life. Each bush is one year old and in a growing condition when delivered to you. No matter where you live, you will receive the bushes at the proper time to plant in your locality. We guarantee that they will reach you in perfect condition. If they do not, or if any of the bushes fail to grow, we will replace them for you free of all cost. Following is a brief description of each of the five different varieties. Please read carefully—and send in your order today.

For One Subscription You Get These Five Prize Beauties!

Alexander Hill Grey A magnificent giant yellow rose, standing head and shoulders above all others of its color, ranking with the American Beauty and the Killarneys in value and grandeur. The color is a deep golden yellow with the edge of the petal a little lighter.

Columbia A very large Rose, the open flower measuring six inches across. The color is a true pink, deepening as it opens to a glowing pink. The shades become more and more intense until the full maturity of the flower is reached, and this color is enduring.

Lady Gay One of the most wonderful of all climbing roses, noted for its sweet and lasting fragrance and immense clusters of double, light pink blossoms—as many as thirty to forty in a single cluster. It has none of the defects of the Rambler but remains free from disease in all climates.

Eugene E. Marlitt One of the finest garden roses, healthy, vigorous and free blooming. The flowers are large and very double and of a rich bright carmine with scarlet tones which do not fade in the hottest weather. It is very hardy, fragrant and keeps up a close succession of bloom.

Bessie Brown A splendid new rose introduced here from Europe and beautiful beyond comparison. It bears large, full, double blossoms on strong, erect stems, is very hardy and fragrant, blooming profusely all through the summer. The color is almost pure white, flushed with pink.

Our Free Offer For only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50c we will send you the above described five Rose Bushes, free by parcel post prepaid. They will be forwarded to you at the proper time for planting in your locality and we guarantee they will reach you in perfect condition. Reward 8661.

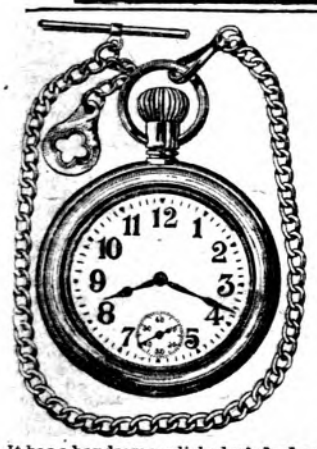
To Round Out Face and Figure Take Mastin's Vitamon Tablets

Clear Skin, Increase Energy and Beautify the Complexion. All Three Vitamines Combined with True Organic Iron and the Necessary Lime Salts in Concentrated Form —Easy to Take and Economical—Results Quick.

Thin or run-down folks who want to quickly get some good, firm, solid flesh on their bones, fill out the hollows and sunken cheeks with strong, healthy tissues, and build up increased energy and vitality should try taking a little Mastin's VITAMON with their meals. Mastin's VITAMON is a tiny tablet containing highly concentrated yeast vitamines as well as the two other still more important vitamines (Fat soluble A and Water-soluble C), together with true organic iron and the necessary lime salts, all of which Science says you must have to be strong, well and fully developed. They help to banish pimples, boils and skin eruptions as if by magic, strengthen the nerves, build up the body with firm flesh and tissue and often completely rejuvenate the whole system. By getting the precious yeast vitamines in this concentrated tablet form you run no risk of causing gas or upsetting the stomach and can be sure of quick, gratifying results.



If you are thin, pale, haggard, drawn looking or lack energy and endurance you should find it well worth while to make this simple test: First weigh yourself and measure yourself. Next take Mastin's VITAMON—two tablets with every meal. Then weigh and measure yourself again each week and continue taking Mastin's VITAMON regularly until you are satisfied with your gain in weight and energy. It is not only a question of how much better you look and feel, or what your friends say and think—the scales and tape measure will tell their own story.

WARNING: Your safety and protection depend upon getting MASTIN'S VITAMON TABLETS—if it isn't MASTIN'S it isn't the Original and Genuine VITAMON—the World's Standard—now used by millions. Beware of imitations, cheap substitutes or so-called "yeast vitamine tablets." Insist upon MASTIN'S. At all good druggists.

band. Second-hand clothes would be welcomed by this poor couple. Mrs. B. F. Tyson, Entwistle, N. C. Almost helpless and with six small children ranging from 12 years to 15 months. This struggling family's only chance of support is a husband with one hand. Send second-hand clothes and money which will buy food for these many hungry mouths.

Winter may be over, but the pain and sorrow of the unfortunates whose names appear this month cannot pass away as does the cold and snow. Their dark days and chill remain. Give of your own to all these who find life a constant burden and struggle that no seasons alter. They need so much. Grant them ready and real aid, cousins, and your own hearts will be happier and more April-like.

Lovingly,

Uncle Lisha

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

How to become a Member

Send fifty-five cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

To The Point

Lovers are not necessarily alike because they correspond.

The most of the slips occur after the cup has been to the lip.

The woman who is a good talker is apt to be a good auditor.

No jeweler has ever been able to improve on the setting of the sun.

The fortune hunter chooses a handsome figure rather than a pretty face.

Spiritualists tip the table, but the man who tips the waiter fares better.

When instinct governs some men's actions instinct is only another name for a wife.

If one's faults showed on the surface most people would look as if they had the measles.

A divorce suit is often included in the wardrobe of an actress for advertising purposes.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address but we will print only initials if so requested.

R. H. B., Hammond, La.—The new Ku Klux Klan, the Southern organization that has been the subject of so much recent discussion in Congress and in the newspapers, has its headquarters at Atlanta, Georgia. For the information you require you should address Imperial Wizard Joseph W. Simmons in that city. (2) We know of no Louisiana law that would prevent the formation of a branch of the Ku Klux Klan in your locality.

H. L. B., Richey, Miss.—Your California gold half-dollar of 1852, with thirteen stars, commands a small premium. Coins of this issue are worth about $1.10 each, if in good condition.

Mrs. C. C. J., Oregon.—Applications for patents are made to the Commissioner of Patents, Washington, D. C. The Patent Office itself states that "it is advised that in every case the services of a competent registered patent attorney be secured, as the value of patents depends largely upon the skillful preparation of the specifications and claims. The patent office cannot recommend any particular attorney or firm." Upon the filing of an application and the payment of the required fees, a patent will be granted you if it appears to the office, after examination of your claims, that you are justly entitled to a patent under the law, and that your invention is sufficiently useful and important to be so protected. Fees are payable in advance, and are as follows: on filing each original application, $20. On issuing each patent, $15. (2) Trade-marks are registered at the Patent Office by the issuing of a certificate, the fee of which is $10. There are various details relating to the law governing the registration of trade-marks which are too lengthy for publication here. The Commissioner of Patents will, upon request, supply you with a copy of this law.

T. L. B., Lowden, Wash.—Although Australia is a big country which, with its sparse population and undeveloped lands, must offer more opportunities than more settled regions, yet a considerable part of the interior of the great island continent is practically a desert because of insufficient rain, while the northern portion has a hot climate due to its tropical situation. For more particulars than we have space for here, write to the Australian Trade Commissioner, 61 Broadway, New York City. Remember it is a long way to go—if you should not like it when you arrive.

W. H., Valley, Nebr.—Thomas Alva Edison, the celebrated inventor, was born February 11th, 1847. Mr. Edison is not blind.

H. S. W., Ala.—Necessarily the securing of the privileges granted by a patent requires some expense. The fees of the Patent Office amount to $35. See reply to Mrs. C. C. J., Oregon, in this issue.

G. J., Virginia.—As a child must creep before it can walk, so you cannot expect to market your work as a writer until you have conquered the grammar of our language. Tackle this first before you enter competition with those trained and experienced. You have plenty of time; Joseph Conrad did not turn to authorship until he had reached the age of forty. We write this because you ask "to who" you may sell your stories, when "to whom" would fit an editor's notions much better.

E. C., Washington.—Common sense as well as law declares that it was the girl who was married and not her name. If this ceremony was legally performed, and the ages of the couple were within those prescribed by the marriage laws of the state, the fact that the name of the girl was incorrectly given would not void the marriage nor affect the legitimacy of children born in wedlock.

Mrs. J. H. D., Kentucky.—There is no premium on the coins you describe save on the silver three-cent piece of 1867. This is worth from twenty to forty cents, according to condition of the coin.

F. S., Ariel, Pa.—People believe all sorts of things that are not so—some that the earth is flat and that there is a big hole at the North Pole, for instance. Many persons win amusement and interest out of the device known as a "ouija" board, but the secrets discovered and the events predicted by this little fireside prophet may be believed or not—just as you may elect. We think "ouija" is being taken a little too seriously in your vicinity. Ouija is in the divining-rod class of delusions.

Mrs. C. S., Bluefield, W. Va.—None of your listed coins command a premium except your large copper U. S. cent of 1814. This might be worth anywhere from five cents to a dollar—and this variation in price will show you how much the condition of a coin affects its market value.

E. V. T., South Carolina.—An author may continue to conceal his or her identity behind a pen name, but in these days such secrets are difficult to keep. It is the custom for manuscripts to be submitted typed the custom for manuscripts to be submitted typed, nary bond typewriter paper of size 8½ by 11. Always mail a manuscript flat or folded, and enclose stamps for return postage.

Mrs. C. F., Texas.—No editorial offices have quoted rates which are paid for serials, and COMFORT is not an exception to this rule. Such prices vary with the length and character of the story and according to the fame of the author. See reply to E. V. T. (2) We cannot attempt the identification of quotations in this department, or we would be forced to crowd out more important inquiries.

A Lonely Wife, Minnesota.—As the soil in your flower pots is already so badly attacked by white worms, you should remove the diseased earth at once and repot with leaf-mold obtained from the woods. We mean by this the fine "woodsy" top-soil which exists in damp rich forest land, directly under the old layers of fallen leaves. Sift this carefully, see that it is free from insects, and use it in the repotting of your suffering flowers. We imagine you may have been watering your house plants too much—which is often as common an error as letting them go too long without moisture. A south window is much better than one facing east, for without a certain measure of direct sunlight, and a sufficiently high and even temperature, no indoor plants can be expected to thrive. Watch out for all these things, and we can promise you that your fading plants will eventually flower again.

A. B. D., Kansas.—For you—and all COMFORT readers—we state here that buffalo nickels and Lincoln pennies are worth exactly their face value and no more.

Mrs. J. M., Oklahoma.—The so-called "state flowers" are as follows: Ala., Goldenrod; Ariz., Saguaro; Ark., Apple Blossom; Cal., Golden Poppy; Col., Columbine; Conn., Mountain Laurel; Del., Peach Blossom; Fla., Orange Blossom; Ga., Cherokee Rose; Idaho, Syringa; Ill., Violet; Ind., Carnation; Iowa, Wld Rose; Kansas, Sunflower; Kentucky, Trumpet Vine; La., Magnolia; Maine, Pine Cone; Md., Blackeyed Susan; Mass., Mayflower; Mich., Apple Blossom; Minn., Moccasin Flower; Miss., Magnolia; Mont., Bitter Root; Nebr., Goldenrod; Nev., Sagebrush; N. H., Purple Lilac; N. J., Violet; N. Mex., Cactus; N. Y., Rose; N. C., Daisy; N. Dak., Wild Prairie Rose; Ohio, Scarlet Carnation; Okla., Mistletoe; Ore., Oregon Grape; R. I., Violet; S. Dak., Pasque Flower; Tenn., Passion Flower; Texas, Bluebonnet; Utah, Sego Lily; Vt., Red Clover; Va., Dogwood; Wash., Rhododendron; W. Va., Rhododendron; Wisc., Violet, and Wyoming, Indian Paintbrush. Missouri, Pennsylvania, South Carolina and the district of Columbia remain flowerless in so far as any communal choice has not been made. Congress has often been urged to adopt a national flower, but this has still to be done by that busy body of legislators who have more than blossoms on their minds at this time.

F. S., Oakland, Md.—The temperature of the regions about the South Pole are colder in summer, and perhaps warmer in winter than those of the Arctic polar region. Nobody will probably ever care to remain long enough to keep a full year's records. During the voyage of the ship Discovery in May, 1903, a temperature of 67 below zero was registered in the South polar region. But perhaps the North Pole could beat this if tested.

Keep Musterole on the bath-room shelf

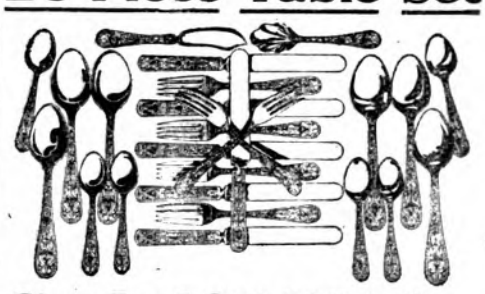
Years ago the old-fashioned mustard plaster was the favorite remedy for rheumatism, lumbago, colds on the chest and sore throat.

It did the work all right, but it was sticky and messy to apply and my how it did burn and blister!

The little white jar of Musterole has taken the place of the stern old mustard plaster.

Keep this soothing ointment on your bathroom shelf and bring it out at the first cough or sniffle, at rheumatism's first warning tingle.

Made from pure oil of mustard, with the blister and sting taken out, Musterole penetrates the skin and goes right down to the seat of the trouble.



Order Musterole today from your druggist. He has it in 35c and 65c jars and tubes; hospital size, $3.

BETTER THAN A MUSTARD PLASTER

MUSTEROLE — WILL NOT BLISTER

26-Piece Table Set

Given For A Club Of Only Five

WE have made many offers of table-ware, but this is the first time we have been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for so small a club. And please don't think that because we are giving this set on such liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. On the contrary, it has a white metal base; therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration, there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a reward for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have offered and we guarantee every set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this 26-Piece Table Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special offer.

Miss A. C., Waverly, Iowa.—Diet and exercise are the sheet-anchors in flesh reduction. On alternate days, for food and drink, use only one quart of skimmed-milk in divided doses, or amounts. To "the sore on leg," apply white precipitate ointment, and also wear during the day an elastic bandage. Remove the bandage at night and apply the first thing in the morning. In this way you will cure the varicose ulcer.

Mrs. C. T., Comstock, N. Y.—"Night-horrors" are due to indigestion. Have the boy's bowels kept open and give him at night a five-grain tablet of bromide of sodium.

Mrs. J. L., St. Louis, Mo.—Take, for the rheumatism, after meals some five-grain tablets of salicylate of sodium.

Miss B. H., Pilot Mountain, N. C.—There is no simple remedy for wrinkles in face or forehead. If they are marked and very deep, especially under the eyes, an operation is indicated which will draw up and smooth out the excessive amount of skin. On the other hand, if the condition is not too marked, massage of the forehead and face daily with cocoa butter will help the condition.

Mrs. C. E. B., St. Francis, Kansas.—From symptoms given, you seem to have a nervous indigestion. Take, after meals, five-grain pills of asafœtida and avoid eating sweets of all kinds.

Mr. H. S. J., Wadena, Minn.—Probably you have a chronic catarrh due to enlarged tonsils and adenoids. Be operated on for this condition, and the morning and daily discharge of muco-purulent matter will clear up as you recover from the operation. Of course, as you can imagine, swallowing tainted mucous of this kind would destroy your appetite and lead up to a chronic dyspepsia as well as mal-nutrition.

Mrs. M. W., Bronson, Mich.—You can remedy the chronic constipation by using cascara sagrada pills at night. Take one or two, as indicated. Bicarbonate of soda tablets will help the gas also. Take ten-grain tablets after meals. Of course, avoid starchy foods of all kinds and drink plenty of water. The soda tablets will also help your muscular rheumatism.

Mrs. A. H. H., Terra Bella, Calif.—Your brother has a mild form of epilepsy. He should eat sparingly at all times, take plenty of exercise in the open, avoid excitement of all kinds, and probably would be benefited with an outdoor life on some farm where the temperature is not too high. He should also take ten-grain tablets of bromide of potassium after meals, and keep his bowels free. Regimen, care and exercise are indicated in all cases of this kind.

Miss M. W., Nevada, Mo.—You probably have nasal polyps, which should be removed, and also may have adenoids as well as enlarged tonsils. Have the polyps removed and also the throat and tonsils operated on at once and all of your symptoms will be remedied in a short time. You will not have tuberculosis in any case as there is no relation between polyps, adenoids, etc., to tuberculosis. Have the operations done at once, this is the only sure way to remove or cure your condition.

Mrs. M. C. D., Lucile, Idaho.—Bunions, if severe and of long standing, must be operated on and the joint and toe straightened. If only a slight and recent condition, apply, at night, a thirty per cent. ointment of ichthyol. Also have your shoes made to order, so that pressure may be removed from the joint. The superfluous hair can only be cured by having the hairs removed by use of the electric cautery or electric needle.

Miss K. J., Anniston, Ala.—Your "joint creaks" because the joints do not have a sufficient fluid in them. Massage the joints with cocoa butter. The wrinkles can be removed by operation or massage.

Mrs. N. L. A., Westernport, Md.—Your husband may have Bright's disease. Have the urine examined and find out just the condition of his kidneys. Milk diet is indicated in any case of this kind.

Mrs. C. I. B., Longmont, Colo.—Maybe you have a tapeworm. Watch the stools and see if you pass any links of the worm. If so, advise us and we will prescribe a cure for you.

Mrs. S. M. R., Gering, Nebr.—Chewing ground coffee is very harmful. Chew, instead, any good chewing gum.

Mr. J. W., Gemmell, Minn.—Your son must and should go to school. By going to school he may get rid of the stuttering and nervousness due to his defective speech.

Mrs. C. H. B., Medford, Wisc.—Your trouble is probably due to malarial poisoning. Try a teaspoonful of modified Warburg's tincture after meals.

Mrs. J. W. T., Sulphur Springs, Ark.—Your husband should take a teaspoonful of Warburg's tincture after meals. Better get the modified tincture as it contains aloes and will keep the bowels regular as well as counteract any malarial influence that may be causing the "chills and fever."

Mrs. M. M. S., Stratford, Okla.—Be examined for correcting lenses. Also apply at night to the inflamed lids a one per cent. yellow oxide of mercury ointment.

water in the room and close the doors and windows. The steam softens the paper so that it can be removed easily.

When the linings of boots or shoes are worn through at the heels, cover with adhesive plaster. Adhesive plaster is also useful for mending overshoes and rubbers.

A hot shovel held over white spots on varnished furniture will remove them.—Mrs. J. E. N., Canton, N. C.

Put a large Turkish towel in bottom of bathtub and there will be less danger of slipping.

Discarded window shades make excellent covering for ironing board. Boil until all stiffening and color have been removed, dry and tack onto board.—Dixie Sister.

Quilts for children's beds become soiled so quickly that it is advisable to have them made of wash material. I found it a great saver of time and labor to enclose the batting in a mosquito netting cover, before covering with whatever material used for outside. When soiled it is an easy matter to remove cover while the batting remains soft. It could be put on line and aired thoroughly. Have never tried this idea for making pillows but should think it could be carried out successfully.—Mrs. Myrtle M., Baltimore, Md.

Remedies

Burns.—Dip or hold burned part in gasolene.—Mrs. Nellie Vail, Byron, Wyo.

Iodine put in tooth on absorbent cotton, stops ache. Is not harmful.—Mrs. Maud M., Bismarck, N. D.

Worms.—Make a tea of dry sage, sweeten to taste and give a drink of this, half a cupful, before breakfast, three mornings in succession.—Mrs. John T. Headley, Fleming, R. R. 2, Colo.

Sprains.—Use hot water and Epsom salts for sprains, one tablespoonful of salts to two quarts of water.

Lime-Water.—Put one cup of unslaked lime in large bottle, add one-half gallon of water, cork well and shake several times during day. Next morning pour off most of water and throw away. Fill again with water, shake well and when settled decant into smaller bottles to be kept on toilet stand. As long as lime remains, water may be added. This can be used for the teeth and I use it in my baby's milk.—Mrs. John A. Wrye, Argyle, N. Y.

Lemon Cure for Lung Trouble.—Put one dozen whole lemons in cold water and then boil until soft. Roll and squeeze until all the juice is extracted. Sweeten juice enough to make it palatable and drink. Use as many as a dozen lemons a day. Should they cause pain, lessen the quantity to half, increase gradually until a dozen a day can be taken. By the time you have used five or six dozen you will begin to gain strength and appetite.—Mrs. Maude Morgan, Marietta, Mississippi.

The Bright Side

There is many a rest on the road of life,
If we only would stop to take it;
And many a tone from the better land,
If the querulous heart would wake it.

To the sunny soul that is full of hope,
And whose beautiful trust never faileth,
The grass is green and the flowers are bright,
Though the wintry storm prevaileth.

Better to hope though the clouds hang low,
And to keep the eyes still lifted;
For the sweet blue sky will soon peep through,
When the ominous clouds are rifted.

There was never a night without a day,
Nor an evening without a morning;
And the darkest hour, the proverb goes,
Is just before the dawning.

There is many a gem in the path of life,
Which we pass in our idle pleasure,
That is richer far than the jeweled crown
Or the miser's hoarded treasure.

It may be the love of a little child,
Or a mother's prayer to heaven,
Or only a beggar's grateful thanks
For a cup of water given.

Better to weave in the web of life
A bright and golden filling,
And to do God's will with a ready heart,
And hands that are swift and willing.

Than to snap the delicate silver threads
Of our curious lives asunder,
And then blame heaven for the tangled ends,
And sit to grieve and wonder.

Three Wheel Chairs in March

633 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The three March wheel chairs go to Monroe Franklin White, Lonoke, Ark., 83; Clydies Lonease Peacock, Slocomb, Ala., 72; Clovis Colvin, Vienna, La., 58. The figures following their respective names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them.

Monroe Franklin White age 7, has been afflicted with hydrocephalus (dropsy of the brain) since early infancy which has caused partial paralysis of his left side and deprived him of the use of his left hand, and resulted in the enlargement of his head so that he cannot sit up much because of inability to hold his head up. His father is dead, and he is dependent on his grandparents.

Clydies Lonease Peacock, age about 5, has been crippled from her hips down since September, 1920, as the result of infantile paralysis. She is a bright and cheerful little girl, and her mother writes the wheel chair will be "a lot of pleasure" to the child and a great help to herself in caring for her.

Clovis Colvin, age 8, is unable to walk and has no use of her left hand. Although thus afflicted since birth she is very intelligent and will greatly appreciate and enjoy her wheel chair.

Three sad cases, these, of children that have never known the joys of active childhood and have not even had the relief and comfort of a much needed wheel chair.

On this page I am reproducing the interesting pictures of two more of the many crippled shut-ins that have been made happy by receiving a COMFORT wheel chair. The photograph of little Thomas Heller, Camden, Delaware, was sent in by Mrs. Wm. T. Jensen who did so much in getting the subscriptions for this boy's chair. The picture of Miss Eda Pierce came some time ago in a letter of thanks from her and her niece which also appears on this page.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT,
Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscriptions, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Comfort Wheel Chair a Great Help

Turney, Texas.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

We enclose a picture of Miss Eda Pierce enjoying her COMFORT wheel chair. It was taken out of doors in the bright sunshine, the second time she had been out of doors in several months. She said she had the "sun grins" but maybe it would do to reproduce. The chair is a great help to us, and we wish to express our appreciation of the kindness of those who helped to secure the subscriptions for it. Aunt Eda and I hope you can spare the space to print the names of these helpers with the number of subscriptions they obtained, as follows: Mrs. Jimmie Bounds, 1; Mrs. Lillie Stephens, 2; Mrs. Gertrude Bailey, 3; Mrs. Annie Dowell, 4; Mrs. Dock Jones, 5; Mrs. H. A. Megginson, 7; Mrs. May Wright, 9; Miss Bertha Belk, 15; Mrs. J. W. Belk, 27. Hoping each and every COMFORT subscriber may get much comfort out of your good magazine, we are

Sincerely your friends,
Eda and Ollie Pierce.

The Story of "Grog"

Grog is a sailor's way of designating brandy, whiskey, or any kind of intoxicating liquor that has been mixed with water. The word "groggy" meaning unsteady, originated from the same source.

Admiral Vernon of the British navy in 1740 became very unpopular with the sailors when he ordered each man's allotment of brandy mixed with water. This was done because, on previous trips, the water supply had run low.

The new ruling was disliked among the hardy sailors because they were in the habit of drinking their brandy neat.

Vernon, while in service, always wore a big grogam coat which hung loosely from his shoulders. Because of this, sailors nicknamed him "Old Grog", which afterwards they applied to the drink he concocted for them.

Miss High C—"So does the audience."—Boston Herald.

Schoolboy Roosevelt

A good story is recalled of ex-President Roosevelt's schooldays. He was once requested to recite a poem, beginning—

At midnight, in his guarded tent
The Turk lay dreaming of the hour,
When Greece, her knee in suppliance bent,
Should tremble at his power.

He got only as far as the third line, when he began to hesitate. Twice he repeated, "Greece, her knee," and then stopped dead. The old professor beamed on him over his glasses, and then dryly remarked:

"Greece her knee once more, Theodore. Perhaps she'll go easier then."

6-Piece Library Set

Fumed Solid Oak

A Room Full of Furniture

Price Slashed

This Entire Set of Furniture—6 Pieces—

Now $22.85

Seize this opportunity now. Send the coupon with only $1.00 and we'll ship this entire 6-piece fumed solid oak living room or library set to your home on 30 days trial. We've smashed the price on this sensational offer. A few months ago we had to charge $35.90 for this very same set. But now, because the factory needed money and we had the cash, we are able to cut the price on this roomful of furniture way down to $22.85! And you get this rock bottom price on easy monthly payments of only $2.50 a month! Where can you match this bargain—anywhere? Only $1.00 brings the entire set on approval—we take the risk.

6-Piece Set

Fumed Solid Oak

This superb 6 piece set is made of selected solid oak throughout, finished in rich, dull waxed, brown fumed oak. All the four pieces are padded; seats upholstered with brown Delavan Spanish leather, the best imitation of genuine Spanish leather known. The upholstering is of a rich brown color, and will give you the best possible service.

Arm Chair is a roomy, dignified piece of furniture, comfortable and big enough for a very large person while not seeming too large for the ordinary occupant. Seat, 19x17 1-2 in., height 36 in.

Arm Rocker is a massive, stately, comfortable piece, with beautifully designed back, wide, shapely arms, and smooth operating runners. Seat, 19x17 1-2 in., height 36 in.

Sewing Rocker is unusually attractive and useful. Seat 17x17 in., height 35 in.

Reception Chair has beautiful shape to match the other pieces. Seat measures 17x17 in., height 35 in.

Library Table—a beautiful piece of library furniture. Has beautifully designed ends to match the chairs with roomy magazine shelf below. Legs cut of 2 in. stock; massive, dignified. Top measures 23 1-4x34 in.

Jardiniere Stand matches other pieces. A decoration to your living room or library. Carefully built throughout. Measures 17 1 2 in. high; the top 12x12 inches.

Entire set is shipped knocked down construction. Very easy to set up. Saves in freight charges. Weight, about 175 pounds.

Order by No. B6943A. $1.00 with coupon, $2.50 a month, price $22.85.

30 Days Trial!

When you get this magnificent 6-piece library set, put it in your living room or library and use it freely for 30 days. Before you pay another penny examine it thoroughly. Note the massive, solid construction—the beautiful fumed oak finish—the fine upholstery and graceful lines. Convince yourself that this beautiful set will make your home brighter and more beautiful. Compare it with anything you can buy locally at anywhere near the same price —even for spot cash. Then if not satisfied for any reason and convinced that this is a stupendous bargain—you alone to judge—return the set at our expense and we will refund your $1.00 at once, plus any freight charges you paid.

Only $2.50 a Month

If you decide to keep the set, start paying only $2.50 a month until you have paid $22.85—payments so low and so convenient that you will scarcely feel them while you enjoy the proud ownership of so magnificent a set of furniture. A full year to pay—at the rate of only a few cents a day, less than one fritters away every day for trifles. This wonderful value is not listed in our regular catalog. We have only a limited number of sets which we reserve for this acquaintance offer to new customers. We send our complete catalog when we ship the set. We trust honest people anywhere in U. S. One price, cash or credit. No discount for cash, nothing extra for credit. No C. O. D.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

Public Cheated Out of Millions By Investing in Get-Rich-Quick Schemes and Fraudulent Stock

IT is amazing that the American people will give up five hundred millions a year of their good, hard-earned money to swindlers and keep on doing it year after year although repeatedly warned by frequent public exposures of the various methods and devices used by these crooks to gain their confidence and wheedle them into parting with their cash. The success of these nefarious operators is based on an appeal to the desire that most people have to acquire unearned wealth and their willingness to take a gambler's chance in the hope of realizing their wish. In other words it is the combination of greed and folly on the part of the victims quite as much as deceit on the part of the rascals that leads to the undoing of the former. The following illustrations are interesting and we hope that they may prove helpful in saving our readers from getting caught in some similar trap.

Such was the world-wide notoriety given the get-rich-quick scheme by which Charles Ponzi, starting with nothing, in a few months raked in six or eight million dollars in large and small sums from thousands of credulous people in Boston and vicinity that it did not seem possible for a bunco game of the same brand to be worked again on the present generation. That happened only a year ago last fall when Ponzi was arrested and later sentenced in the U. S. Court, in Boston, to serve five years in prison for using the mails to defraud. For weeks the daily and weekly papers throughout the country featured his skyrocket career in finance as the chief sensational topic of the season. The inducement that he held out to the public was the promise of fifty per cent. profit for the use of a depositor's money for a short time ranging from forty-five to ninety days, falsely and fraudulently representing that he was realizing enormous profits from dealing in foreign exchange and foreign return postage coupons. He did not deal in foreign exchange nor in return postage coupons, but paid the early depositors ahead of time with the promised fifty per cent. additional by the simple expedient of using the money of later depositors for this purpose, though he did not disclose this fact but pretended he was only sharing profits with them. As soon as it got noised about that he was actually returning fifty per cent. profit for a few weeks' use of his depositors' money he was overwhelmed by a rush of would-be depositors and money came in faster than his clerks could count and give receipts for it, much less keep proper account of it on his books. He used and spent this money in luxurious living as if it were his own, and when called to account for it he was found to be hopelessly bankrupt. He is now in Plymouth jail on the second year of his sentence while the poor dupes that trusted him are bewailing the loss of their money.

But there is now, as there was in Barnum's day, a never-failing crop of suckers ever ready to bite at an alluring bait. And so, before the newspapers had ceased featuring Ponzi's picture and exploits on the front page an imitator of him launched out on a career of fraud which rivals that of the original. Raymond J. Bischoff, age twenty-seven, is the man who worked the Ponzi game in Chicago unfil stopped by bankruptcy proceedings instituted against him last February. In answer to questions by Judge Landis he acknowledged that he owed at least seven million dollars for money that he had induced thousands of people to entrust to him for speculative purposes. He collected this vast sum in less than two years, largely from people of small means who will suffer because of its loss which in many a case means the sweeping away of the savings of a lifetime, and he has run through with practically all of it; five thousand dollars is the Judge's valuation of all there is left of it. He had twenty agents out canvassing for him and it was no unusual occurrence for them to bring in fifty to seventy-five thousand dollars in a single day. He said that people had confidence in him and that it was easy to induce them to trust him with their money in expectation of inordinate profits; and to some of them he did pay profits ranging from twenty-five to one hundred per cent., which was the bait that kept the suckers coming.

A polite rogue, with an attractive personality and a refined elegance of manners and dress that betokened gentility, and living in luxurious style that indicated a high degree of prosperity, made a specialty of gaining the confidence of property-owning women, mostly lone spinsters and widows without male relatives to advise them in financial matters. His rascality came to light recently when he suddenly absconded leaving some twenty women in and about New York poorer by amounts ranging from five thousand to more than half a million dollars because of having trusted him to handle their money. He got six hundred thousand dollars from one woman and smaller, though large, fortunes from others, leaving most of his victims destitute. He deceived these unsuspecting women by pretending (falsely) that he was intimately associated in business with the greatest financiers in New York, and made them believe that in this way he had superlative knowledge and opportunities for profitable investment of their funds.

Some Common Swindles that Are Always Being Worked

The foregoing are samples of somewhat novel and spectacular methods now and then devised by some perverted genius. They usually run a phenominally successful though brief course, and, when exposed, the wide publicity attained disqualifies them for further use so long as they are held in odious remembrance by the public. But the old swindles of the common sort appear to be endowed with eternal life and perpetual youth, for they are worked continually and can be relied on year after year to attract an endless stream of suckers. Among these old and steady pullers that are working over-time special mention should be made of "bucket shops" that, while pretending to buy and sell stocks on "margin", do not execute orders of that kind but in such cases merely appropriate their customers' money and gamble on the market. If the market goes against the customer the "bucket shop" wins what he loses, but if it happens to go strongly in favor of a large number of customers it is likely to bankrupt the "bucket shop", and in that event the customers lose when they should have won on a square deal. Some States prohibit "bucket shops." At best it is a dangerous gamble for the ordinary man to buy stock on a margin; the only safe rule in this respect is never to do it, and this would eliminate the "bucket shop" question.

Then there is the class of brokers who deal in stocks of such doubtful value and speculative nature that they cannot properly be regarded as "investment securities." A safe rule for the investor is to shun such houses and their wares which latter while holding out an alluring prospect of profit also involve (though not made conspicuous) a chance of loss that the person of small or moderate means cannot afford to take.

Finally there are the promoters of the out-and-out frauds or (what are equally risky) wild and ill-considered development projects. They are a legion in number and name and include almost every kind of business or manufacturing enterprise. The game is to organize a corporation for the pretended purpose of engaging in some line of business in which large fortunes are generally known to have been made. The next step is to sell the stock, and the last is for the promoters to get away with the money, leaving the stockholders with beautifully engraved stock certificates worth less than the value of the blank paper before it was printed.

There are variations in the way the game is worked but certain features are always prominent. A prospectus in the form of a more or less elaborate circular or pamphlet is gotten up describing the property claimed to be owned or proposed to be bought or constructed, the business to be carried on, and an extravagant statement of the profits expected to be realized. Usually copies of the prospectus are sent by mail accompanied by a letter offering the stock for sale, often on the installment plan, and enclosing a subscription blank. In some instances the prospectus has contained pictures of extensive and costly properties falsely represented to be owned by the company. If the intended victims do not bite immediately they are bombarded by a series of "follow-ups" in the form of persuasive letters or, maybe, by telegrams urging immediate purchase of stock "before the price is advanced" or, perhaps, promising a dividend at an early date. Sometimes a dividend is actually declared and paid out of the capital to make it appear that the company is operating profitably when in fact it has neither business nor operating plant. Sometimes the company offers its stock direct, but more often it is done through some brokerage house; and sometimes the stock subscriptions are solicited personally by agents instead of by mail.

At present oil (petroleum) producing and oil land companies lead all others in the field of fraudulent stock promotion schemes. Automobile companies come next. Motion picture producing companies and even packing house projects have been incorporated for the purpose of fraudulent stock sales. The Government keeps a force of detectives continually at work investigating complaints of fraudulent use of the mails and has landed many of the perpetrators in prison, but in most cases the people have been victimized to a large extent before the scheme has been discovered; frequently the rascals make their clean-up, get away with it and vanish from sight, but soon start a new bunco project under a new name in another locality.

How Investors Can Steer Clear of Fraudulent Stock Schemes

There are two good reasons why it is so extremely rare for an experienced investor to get "stung" by a fraudulent stock promotion. First, because such schemes bear certain characteristic earmarks that put him on his guard at once. Some of these have been described but may not readily be detected by inexperienced persons. However there is one unmistakable danger signal —that of promising big dividends, high interest rates or large profits—which should be enough to scare you off. The second reason why the experienced investor does not get "roped" is because he never does business with unreliable brokerage houses. Now if you will adhere strictly to these two rules and go just a step further (which I will suggest) for your own protection you will keep out of the sucker class and be immune to the blandishments of the bunco stock promoter.

The experienced investor knows the reliable brokerage houses that offer their customers only high-grade investment securities; he also knows how to select from these offerings the securities that are best suited to his financial circumstances and investment policy, for even among good, solid bonds and stocks there is a considerable range for the exercise of judgment in choosing. Most people need advice on both these points, and they should get it from their nearest bank; it will be trustworthy and given without charge. Probably the best policy for the small investor is to put his savings into Government, State, county or municipal bonds, or deposit his money in the savings department of some near-by bank; besides the all-important element of safety thus secured, such investments are readily convertible into cash if need be. But don't overlook the danger of loss of your bonds by fire or theft if kept in your home; some bonds may be safeguarded by registration, but the best way is to keep them in a safe-deposit box in some bank that provides such facility at a small cost.

LOYALTY AND LOVE

A Memorial Day Romance

MEMORIAL Day dawned brilliantly in the suburb of Chicago where Mrs. Vivian Wheaton and her small daughter, Alethea, lived.

Life had been hard to Vivian. Widowed at nineteen and a mother at the same age, it seemed hard to doom one so young to the life of a devotee—yet that was what her life had been since the day Fred was killed in France. His memory was the idol of her worship.

In the excitement, stress and turmoil of those April days of 1917, when the country was inflamed and patriotism ran high, Fred Wheaton had enlisted. How irresistible he looked in his uniform though it was only that of a private. The snug-fitting coat emphasized the grace of his lithe young body, and with the trappings of war, Fred became more than human to the impressionable girl of eighteen. No captain could have looked more glorious to her than did Fred.

Then came that dream-like night when they attended a dance a few days before he was to leave. The fever of romance was in their veins, and he whispered that he loved her and asked her to marry him.

Tingling with the wild emotion of the hour, filled with the belief that a volunteer should not be refused anything, and with the witchery of his uniform adding its quota to the intensity of a girl's first love, she accepted him and they were married.

A few days of heaven—and then he was off. His kind mother, who was comfortably fixed, took Vivian to live with her, and they comforted each other in their mutual loss. Still, they were happy for as the days passed, Vivian discovered that a great event was to take place in her life, and the day finally came which bore the news to Fred that he was a father.

Shortly after, trouble descended upon the pretty bungalow. Fred's mother took sick and died, and Vivian had scarcely recovered from the shock of this, when news came to her that Fred had fallen in the Chateau Thierry Drive.

For weeks, blank despair held its cold hand upon her heart. Then she realized that she must think—not of herself but of Alethea. So, like a stricken lily, when the storm has passed, she raised her head and determined to live.

Fred and his mother had so arranged the title to the bungalow that it should become Vivian's property in the case of the death of either of them, and the money in the bank and her insurance were so arranged that she need have no fears for being able to provide for herself. So she lived on in the pretty bungalow, like a cloistered nun, her whole interest wrapped up in Alethea and the memory of Fred.

This, in short, was Vivian's history.

On this Memorial Day, she stepped out into the small garden about the house, and gathered clusters of lilacs and snowballs from the blooming bushes, and fragrant lilies-of-the-valley. The sun was warm, the air fine and clear. Flags were flapping in the breeze and there came to her faintly, distant music—probably the Boy Scouts were assembling for their duties at the cemeteries, or else rehearsing for the big parade that was to take place in the city in the afternoon.

Her fragrant task finished, Vivian went into the house and to Alethea's bed.

"Come, darling," she whispered, "we'll have to get ready. We'll go to the cemetery and decorate Daddy's grave."

The year before, Fred's body had been brought back. When Vivian first beheld the flag-draped box, she had felt that she wanted to die.

But the feeling gradually gave way.

In response to her gentle rousing, little Alethea opened her eyes and yawned a kiss-provoking yawn.

"We going today, mamma?" she queried.

"Yes, dear. Now, we'll have some breakfast and and then I'll dress you and we'll take these flags and flowers and show Daddy that we haven't forgotten him," and with the words, she picked up Alethea and carried her downstairs.

They stopped before a picture of Fred in uniform. He had been a handsome lad and the glamour that a uniform casts about a man made him doubly attractive.

How she loved him!

But as she gazed, she found herself realizing that she was reconciling herself to his loss. The thought startled her, and she hastily brushed it away.

"Come, dear, we'll have breakfast," she said to Alethea, who was babbling sweet nothings to the picture, and they went to the dining-room and there had breakfast, after which Vivian got herself and Alethea ready for the trip to the cemetery.

Memorial services were held in which the veterans of three wars partook; the grizzled old chaps of the Civil War; the boys of the Spanish-American War now in the full bloom of middle age, and the bright, youthful faces of the lads of the World War, "Veterans of the World War" they called themselves, and it seemed a misnomer. To apply the term "veteran" to those boyish faces! And yet, these hoary-headed veterans of the Civil War had once been lads like these!

Vivian went to the little plot in the cemetery where Fred and his mother rested. The flowers she brought were placed in beautiful array upon the grave, but when she draped the flags and a vision of that flag-draped box in which all that was mortal of Fred rested, Vivian wept.

She finally dried her eyes, and taking Alethea by the hand, went to the rostrum where the Memorial services were being held, and listened until Alethea grew restless. So she started for the street car and went to the down-town district where she and Alethea had their lunch, after which they went to Michigan Boulevard and finding a place sat down upon the curbstone to await the coming of the parade.

All the while the crowd deepened until humanity stood six to eight deep on the sidewalk. The broad thoroughfare was kept clear of pedestrians by the untiring efforts of the traffic police, while Chicago's wonderful sky-line presented a flag-be-decked front. In the balconies of the fashionable clubs and hotels, society folk congregated, and all the windows of the buildings held their quotas of humanity.

Now and then detachments of organizations marched along to find their places in the parade and relieved the monotony of the wait with bands that struck up martial or popular music.

After a long wait, a solid phalanx advanced over the new Link Bridge and the parade came.

There were the old Veterans coming along, some with springy step, some halting, and others who had been obliged to acknowledge their infirmities by riding in automobiles but whose faded old eyes, nevertheless, showed deep interest in all that was going on and in the applause they received; there were organizations of the Sons of Veterans, Daughters of Veterans, Women's Relief Corps, Posts of the Spanish-American War Veterans, Veterans of the World War, Posts of the American Legion; Posts of colored veterans who did their bit; the Gold Star Mothers, the Gold Star Fathers, and British, French, Italian, Czecho-Slovakian and Belgian veterans; Naval Reserves, the Illinois National Guard, thousands upon thousands of men marching through cheering, applauding lines.

Between the various groups were interspersed the bands and historical, emblematical floats, mounted officers, great marshaling of flags, always thrilling, ever picturesque.

In the line of march came an immense float, emblematical of "Peace". A girl in white, winged, with a gilded palm-leaf in one hand and a dove in the other, stood benignly over a gathering of men in uniform representing every participant in the great war. The stacked arms, the machine-guns and cannon and other implements of war had their grimness hidden in flowers.

As the lumbering motor truck upon which the pageant was posed creaked by, it bounced into a slight rut and a beautiful lily dropped to the street. Little Alethea, seeing this, made a sudden dive for the flower and into the path of a skittish horse which was curvetting restlessly to the music of the band behind him. At a sudden blare, he broke into a run. With a cream of terror, Vivian ran to the child's rescue. Nothing but the quick action of the rider in leaning down and snatching up the child saved her from being killed, but Vivian was brushed from her feet to the street.

Several policemen rushed forward and picked up the unconscious girl, others were immediately on the spot to preserve order and Vivian was hurried to the Red Cross Emergency Hospital Tent set up before the Public Library, while the parade continued on its way as if nothing had momentarily disturbed it.

Meanwhile, Vivian lay on a cot in the tent, while the sweet-faced nurses worked over her and brought her to consciousness.

"My baby!" was her first exclamation.

The nurse brought Alethea to her, smiling and unharmed.

"Nothing happened to her, dear," she said gently. "Mr. Forsyth caught her up just in time." And then she went on: "Could you see him dear? He's very anxious about you, and feels so dreadfully about the whole occurrence."

"I think I could," Vivian said, and taking Alethea to her, she closed her eyes.

In a moment more, through the tent-flap came a tall, bronzed, good-looking young fellow of about twenty-nine with the insignia of a first lieutenant upon his shoulder.

"Are you hurt very much, Miss—er, ma'am?" he asked with a boyish frankness that was very winsome. "I'm so sorry it all occurred. I haven't been on a horse for a year or more, and I'm afraid I didn't have especially good control of him."

Vivian smiled upon him. "It wasn't your fault. Alethea ran into the street for the lily, see?" and she held up the baby hand which still clasped the lily. "It really was my fault for not watching her more closely. Children will follow their inclinations and dart from your control no matter how much you warn them."

"But you haven't told me whether you are hurt or not," he insisted.

"I'm sure I am not. Your horse just brushed me, and I think I fainted more from fear than from injury. See, I think I can go now."

"I'd rest a bit longer, dear, if I were you," the nurse cautioned gently.

"I'll stay with the soldier man, mamma, "Vivian announced, "I'll play he's my soldier papa."

Vivian sighed. "Alethea's papa was a soldier," she said.

"Oh," remarked Lieutenant Forsyth.

"Yes. But he—he—was killed at Chateau Thierry," Vivian said, turning away.

"Oh," and this expression was something different again than Lieutenant's same exclamation a moment previous.

Without another word, Forsyth took Alethea outside of the tent, and left Vivian to her memories.

For half an hour or more she rested, listening to Alethea's artless prattle outside, and Forsyth's big, cheery voice. There was that in his laugh, so full, so round, yet with no boisterousness, that was very attractive.

Finally she called out to them, and the two came into the tent.

"We'll go now, Alethea," Vivian said.

"You must let me take you home," Forsyth said. "I have my machine here. Won't you do that?"

He was so anxious to make all amends that she felt it would be unjust not to allow him. And yet, while Chicago is a great city, it is a big city and sometimes a very cruel and wicked city if one is not careful.

"But your horse——" she demurred.

"Oh, he's taken care of," he laughed. "Won't you let me do you that little favor?"

They were outside the tent now, and he pointed to a luxurious machine at the curb.

Just then a newsboy rushed by.

"Special extree! All 'bout th' p'rade axidunt!" he yelled.

"Get me a paper," Vivian requested.

"Here, kid!" Forsyth yelled, but when he handed the sheet to her, his cheeks burned.

In headlines four inches high was the announcement:

"RESCUES CHILD IN PARADE."

Then followed:

"Lieutenant Elmer Forsyth by his cool foresight rescued Alethea Wheaton from being crushed to death under the hoofs of the horse he was riding. The child had run from her mother's side to pick up a lily which had dropped from the "Peace" float.

"Before he knew it, he was upon the child. Lieutenant Forsyth snatched up the babe and saved her from injury though Mrs. Wheaton, the child's mother, who was knocked down in making a dash for the child, was rushed to the Emergency Hospital Tent where it was laterly said she was not seriously hurt.

"Lieutenant Forsyth was decorated for bravery. His home is on the North Shore and he is connected with the Spread Eagle Automobile Company. He is a member of many of our exclusive and prominent clubs."

It doesn't take much to make a Chicago reporter make a mountain out of a mole-hill, does it?" he queried, just a little embarrassed.

Vivian smiled. "It is their living, and makes interesting reading for the public, although it is rather embarrassing to the participants."

The newspaper story, however, was proof enough of the social standing of Alethea's rescuer, so Vivian allowed herself to enter the luxurious Spread-Eagle car, and soon it was nosing its way through the dense crowds that spread over street and sidewalk for the parade was now over and citizens, soldiers, Boy Scouts and everybody mixed in one great jam as they made for suburban train, "L" train or street car to take them to their homes.

Forsyth had a way of getting through the crowds and soon the jam began to thin out, the machine increased in speed until they were fairly flying toward the suburb in which Vivian and Alethea lived.

The bungalow reached, Forsyth helped them down, and followed Vivian and Alethea to the porch where he lingered while she unlocked the door.

"Is there anything that I could do for you before I go?" he asked. "And here is my card in case anything serious should develop from today's accident."

She accepted the card, but he still lingered, and his desire to remain was so pronounced that Vivian, with a good-humored little smile, asked if he'd like to stay and have a cup of tea.

"Why——" he started to accept with alacrity, then evidently not wishing to seem too anxious, he said: "If it won't be too much trouble, I would indeed."

"None at all," Vivian replied, "and as the evening is so lovely, shall we have it out on the porch?"

"That will be nice," he agreed, and seated himself in the porch swing with Alethea, while Vivian went into the house.

Presently she brought out a little card-table which she set up, and then handed him a book of snap-shots.

"Perhaps these may interest you. They are pictures my husband took in France. It was my pleasure to mount, date and title them according to the notations he made on the backs of them. This is Mr. Wheaton."

Forsyth looked at the handsome young face.

He shook his head. "No, I didn't know him, but he looks like a very nice lad."

Vivian with a little nod left them and Forsyth turned the pages.

"That's my Daddy," Alethea ventured, at each appearance of Fred in the pictures, "he's in heaven."

Unconsciously the child snuggled to Forsyth and looked at the pictures with him.

"Do Daddies ever come from heaven?" she queried suddenly.

Forsyth looked compassionately upon her.

"No, dear," he said slowly, "Daddies don't ever come from heaven. But you'll see him when you go there."

"That will be a long time before I go, won't it?" she queried.

"For your mother's sake, dear child, I hope it will be a very, very long time," and he placed a gentle hand upon her head.

Vivian, bringing some of the tea things, glimpsed the tender little action.

A sudden emotion seized her, a yearning toward the man who, only that morning, she had not known existed. It horrified her, for she knew that sudden yearning—she knew what it was! She knew!

Her heart was responding to the man who so tenderly regarded her child. It was vile, monstrous! Disloyal!

Crushing down the wild impulse, she fled to the kitchen where she remained until she had her emotions in control and the high color from her cheeks, and finally she became calm enough to do her duties as hostess.

Yet, while she would not admit it, there was something very sweet in having Forsyth sitting there; he looked so strong and reliable, just the kind of man one would want to hide behind in trouble, knowing full well that that broad breast would be given to receive all buffets that might come. That it had defied the foe was mutely attested by the several decorations it bore.

They chatted of the war, naturally, for it was a topic they had in common. Vivian told of Fred's experiences as she knew them through his letters, while Forsyth related his, making light of his own bravery that gave truth to his colorful tales.

At length it was getting dark, even the daylight saving time that held sway in Chicago was being slowly but surely defeated by the oncoming night. Still Forsyth lingered until realizing that perhaps for a perfect stranger he was overstaying the bounds of propriety, he rose with an almost regretful sigh.

"I have had a very pleasant afternoon and evening," he said. "I wonder if you will allow me to call again?"

Vivian hesitated; desire made her want to extend the invitation, yet loyalty to Fred held her back.

"If you'd rather not——" Forsyth began regretfully. "Perhaps I am disturbing tender memories——"

She looked at him, a bit startled. Was he reading her mind so well?

"It isn't that——" she faltered. "I should like to have you call again but—but——"

"Is it because I am a perfect stranger?"

"I am all alone," she murmured.

"And fear what your neighbors may say, perhaps? But surely if my calling is not objectionable to you, you are entitled to some company. It is hardly fair to expect you to shut yourself up like a nun and remain apart from the world. It would be such a pleasure for me to call. Won't you let me?"

She wanted to, ah, she wanted to, and the spell that uniform casts was upon her. Possibly if she saw him in civilian clothes the glamour would be gone and her loyalty to Fred which had been so rudely shaken would regain its equilibrium.

"If it will please you, you may," she said.

"Thank you. Good night," and he went down the dark path, while Vivian gathered Alethea in her arms, and sat in the porch swing, listening. She heard him slam the car door, then the buzz of the self-starter on the machine, then the whirr as he raced the engine a moment—and he was gone.

Gone, she ran to her shrine, Fred's picture. But a sudden realization came to her. The realization that the hurt which we so tenderly cherished is completely healed, the pain gone and only the scar left.

It shocked her to find how completely it was healed. Had her love been a myth? No, she had loved him truly and had he returned all would have been well, but Nature is stronger than will sometimes and the desire for human companionship which had been slowly growing was demanding a hearing now!

She wanted someone—she wanted companionship—she wanted someone!

"Oh, Fred, why were you taken from me?"

But all her caressing of Alethea would not down her desire to see Lieutenant Forsyth again, and when he came again in response to her invitation, Vivian found, with something like despair, that it had not been the uniform but an actual love that had sprung up in her heart and all because of his kindness to little Alethea.

He called again, and yet again and Vivian knew that he loved her; but had she the right to chance Alethea's happiness by giving her a stepfather?

The need for a decision came. One of those glorious summer evenings when love demands its own. And Forsyth whispered the words, simply, manly, with a compelling earnestness that booked no refusal, especially when they were whispered to a heart that wanted to accept.

Still:

"I don't know, oh, I don't know," she said.

"Why don't you know?" he questioned kindly. "You love me, don't you?"

"Yes, but Alethea——"

"I love her as my own, but will you let her decide?"

Vivian nodded.

He called Alethea to him.

"Listen, Alethea dear, would you like to have two Daddies?"

"Two Daddies?" she queried, puzzled.

"Yes, dear. One here and one in heaven?"

"Who'll be my Daddy here? You?"

"Would you like to have me?"

"Oh, yes. 'Cause I like soldier Daddies."

"There, Vivian, dear," Forsyth said. "Are you satisfied?"

The years proved that Alethea's choice of a new Daddy had been well made.

"A Little Culture"

"MAMMY, it's the only thing I know how to do," declared Suzanne Lewis.

"Ah ain' gwine hab mah chile learnin' no po' W'ite trash manners," said Mammy.

"But, Mammy, when you're an orphan and your guardian elopes with your money and you have to do something, and you've never been trained, and——"

"Honey, W'at yo' nice frien's gwine thunk 'bout yo'?"

"I have to earn money. Noy listen, Mammy——"

And Suzanne proceeded to unfold her plan. She would pawn some jewelry and rent a "studio" and then advertise for persons desiring to attain "polish." Mammy would be chaperone. But no glowing words could move Mammy, and in desperation the girl sent for Pat Blair, one of her "nice friends."

"Nope, it won't do," he said, "marry me instead."

Being finally convinced that Suzanne was obdurate, he agreed to help and rented a "studio" which had once been a saloon, and was cheap and well located. The next day the papers had the following advertisement:

"DO YOU EVER WISH YOU HAD NO HANDS AND FEET?"
"Are you ever tongue-tied?
"Do you prefer to eat alone?
"Don't you want to learn to appreciate your hands and feet?
"Don't you want to know how to greet the President?
"Don't you want to know how to dine with potentates?
"Apply 224 Elm Street.
"ALL BRANCHES OF ETIQUETTE TAUGHT."

"My Gawd! Lamp this ad," and pretty Eudora Payne handed Mrs. Cæsar Rocah the paper.

"Boys, listen," commanded stout Mrs. Rocah, and she read aloud the unusual advertisement.

Jupiter Jones, a pleasant-appearing young man, and Oliver Kilmansegg, stern and middle-aged, listened and became enthusiastic.

After a short discussion, "That's what we want," Kilmansegg said, "a little culture. Get your lids on and let's beat it to this joint pronto."

Suzanne received the party graciously, but Mammy was openly suspicious.

"We will pay well," Kilmansegg stated, "to acquire polish."

"We want to go with the best people," and Mrs. Roach smiled.

"You teach us, introduce us in society," Kilmansegg began.

Jupiter interrupted: "However, we must insist that you take no other—er—pupils for the present."

"We will pay well," insisted Kilmansegg. "Business, this, must have agreement signed."

He produced an agreement which they all signed, whereby Suzanne gave each one an afternoon a week, in return for a goodly sum and took no other pupils.

* * * * * * * *

The officer on the beat, one Finnegan, grew suspicious when he saw the same persons, always well dressed, entering the erstwhile saloon at the same hour on the same days, and he believed he recognized two of them,—as old customers of the bar.

The lessons progressed, the pupils improved. Mrs. Cæsar Roach now managed a train exquisitely; Eudora's use of slang had been curtailed; Jupiter made a lovely bow, and Kilmansegg used his hands and feet as if they were his own.

The pupils now thought they were ready to be "introduced," so Suzanne asked the long-suffering Pat to invite them to a house party.

Who knows? Perhaps the moon got in some good work. Kilmansegg became smitten of a wealthy widow, a Mrs. Stewart, much to Mrs. Roach's disgust. Pat, brought to a sudden realization of Eudora's charms, succeeded in making Suzanne jealous. Out of pique the girl encouraged the admiring Jupiter.

During the evening Mrs. Stewart hysterically declared that her pearls were missing. There was great excitement and Pat with Jupiter's assistance instituted a vain search. The next morning the jewelry of several other guests had disappeared, Mrs. Roach asserting she had lost much of value.

"I must notify the police," Pat said.

"My dear fellow, consider the unpleasant publicity," was Kilmansegg's objection.

"How awful!" breathed Mrs. Roach. "I would rather lose my jewels than get into the vulgar newspapers."

Suzanne said nothing.

"I don't like to say anything," Eudora began, "but I saw one of the maids snooping around and acting suspiciously."

Mrs. Roach said she had noticed the maid's actions also.

Despite protestations, Pat sent for a detective. Suzanne's pupils were openly skeptical of his prowess, and laughed unpleasantly when his search proved a vain one.

"I am disgusted with this culture stuff," Jupiter said, one afternoon several weeks later, "let's give it up."

Eudora laughed. "Jupiter's soft on Miss Lewis."

"I never regretted what I am until I knew Miss Lewis," he declared seriously.

Eudora snickered and the others smiled.

After a lengthy discussion Jupiter persuaded them to his way of thinking.

"Mammy," Suzanne said, "my pupils are leaving tomorrow and in appreciation of my good work they are giving a little farewell dinner at the studio. They want Pat, too."

Mammy spoke scornfully: "Ah, cain' nohow see how-come yo' diden' marry wif' Massa Pat 'stid ob aimin' fo'——"

"Oh!" and Suzanne patted the old negress' shoulder affectionately, "I've made loads of money."

"Ah'm gwine tol' Massa Pat to mak' yo' all marry wif' him immejit."

"But, I don't want to. He's so usual. You know exactly what he's going to do and say."

The studio presented a festive appearance for the dinner but Mammy served with ill grace the "po' w'ite trash." The dinner progressed smoothly with each pupil a pride to the teacher. They had reached the demi-tasse stage when the door opened and Patrolman Finnegan entered, followed by a squad of other bluecoats. Finnegan advanced a little and then stopped short, apparently disconcerted. Instead of the gambling and drinking he had expected, he found a peaceful dinner party, but Suzanne's guests, unaware of the reason for his entrance, began to fidget uneasily.

It seemed to Kilmansegg that Finnegan's eye never left him, and finally, in sheer nervousness, he jumped from his chair and said, "I admit it, and I'll turn state's evidence if you do your best

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Junius Beckwith, a Westpointer, Anne Gordon, wealthy, Marian Reade, companion, friend and protegee of Anne Gordon, occupy a box at the Metropolitan Opera House. The curtain falls and Beckwith admits that "Lucia di Lammermore" has a depressing influence upon him and he cannot think of insanity without repulsion, no matter what the cause may be, and a marriage with either tainted, should be made a crime punishable by law. The next morning is Marian's birthday and deciding to go home, Anne Gordon, with a premonition that she ought to stay, exacts a promise, if any trouble comes, Marian will let her know first. Marian walks away and turning the corner meets June Beckwith and they go to the park. Remembering it is her birthday, he offers his love as a gift and asks her to be his wife. Happy in her love for June, Marian reaches home. Janet Reade, her grandmother, tells her that her mother is not dead but the inmate of a madhouse. What can she say to June? Hearing a voice, she answers to her father's call. He gives her a curious Venetian ring for a birthday gift, and questioning him where he got it he evades the answer and queries what Anne Gordon gives her. Showing the watch, her father berates Marian's friend. She might have given one thousand dollars, which he needs and will have. Marian, under the horror of all she hears, forgets all her grandmother told her, even forgets June Beckwith. Later in the night, recalling her promise to Anne Gordon, she goes to her home. A light flashed from a window opposite shows a rope hung from Anne Gordon's window, and in the window her father's face. Reaching home, Marian meets her father, tells him where he has been, and for no honest purpose, and demands that he return all he has stolen. He refuses, and only after her earnest pleading does he ask what she will do for him. Little dreaming the price she must pay, she asks for nothing but to serve him and she seals the promise upon her mother's Bible. Left alone, Paul Reade decides to keep one ring. Marian writes June she does not love him and that her soul is withered as much as the flower she encloses. Her father assures her he has obtained a position in the brokerage business and rented a house down town. June is stunned upon receiving Marian's letter and welcomes his friend, Fred Underwood, who tells him Paul Reade is a most unscrupulous villain and the house he has rented is a decoy for gamblers, that Marian is not as innocent as she appears. June cannot believe it, and Underwood will prove it to him if he cares to go. June calling upon Anne, she tells of Paul Reade's sudden wealth, and June, knowing where it comes from, as a friend, forbids Anne to go to Marian Reade's home. Going to the reception, Underwood requests Paul Reade to introduce Marian. In the meanwhile June appears with a message from Miss Gordon. He invites Marian for a waltz which she ends with Dick Gresham, the most notorious gambler in New York. The evening ended, Marian faces her father and asks who were those people. She receives no satisfaction from his answer—he expects her to receive them with courtesy, she has sworn to obey him. Anne begs Marian to come to her for a home, to divulge the secret that troubles her and she denies she has one. June Beckwith calls upon Anne, who defends Marian and with tears in her eyes pleads with him not to condemn her. If he never loved Anne before he thinks he does now and she is willing to be his wife. Marian speaks to her father of her mother and what has kept her from Marian all these years. She must see her. Her father refuses and Marian insists. There are those who will help. Paul Reade requests Ezra Morris, whose mother is hopelessly insane and confined in a house built especially for her, to allow Marian to visit her, believing she is her mother. Returning home she cries, "will the inheritance come to her?" Dick Gresham announces Anne's betrothal to Junius Beckwith, and for several days Marian remains in her room. Again mingling with her father's guests, she is introduced to Elliott Dwight, a multi-millionaire who, by his words and manner, arouses Marian's suspicions as to his motives. She demands of her father, and before his guests, to deny that she is an inmate of a gambling house, a decoy by his will for his guests, that it is not as Elliott Dwight says. Her father's silence convinces her it is true and in her anguish Marian leaves the house. She is stopped by Fred Underwood who exacts a promise that she will see him before making a decided change. Her heart sinks. June believes her guilty. Underwood admits he is in a most uncomfortable position. June loves Marian, Anne Gordon loves June and I love Anne Gordon. Janet Reade goes to Anne Gordon; she knows her son is not only a gambler but a thief, and has stolen from Anne, detected by his daughter and innocent of the character of the house Marian leaves as soon as the truth comes to her. Fred Underwood takes Marian to Wildhurst where she meets Mrs. King, to whom she is strongly attracted and who tells her that Wildhurst joins Judson's Asylum. June going to see Anne, she tells him that Marian is innocent of their suspicions, and talking with Underwood, June admits she is not responsibe for the sins of her father. Marian, seeking Dr. Judson, asks permission of him to see the lady down by the lake. He refuses and she claims the right—she has seen her—it is her mother. Dr. Judson proves it is impossible; she is the mother of old Ezra Morris and has been confined there thirty years, and the inference is her mother is not dead apd is sane.

CHAPTER XXX.

MRS. KING'S INFLUENCE.

MARIAN remained for some time talking with Doctor Judson, though it must be confessed that there was little enough that was new in their conversation.

They sent the telegram, and then she told him more of her life, he, in turn, convincing her more thoroughly that it was impossible for the woman in the cottage by the lake to be her mother, and thereby relieving her of perhaps the greatest of the shadows that had rested on her life.

"It is my belief that you will find your mother as sane as you are," he said to her, as she stood on the stoop, preparing to return to Wildhurst. "If you care to bring your friend, Underwood, here, do [illegible] and we will talk the whole situation over together, and perhaps I may be able to make some suggestions to him. Since you have confided in me so much, I take it that there will be little that you desire to keep from me. I am afraid you would think that I had absorbed some of the lunacy with which I am surrounded if I were to tell you a crazy thought that has come into my brain."

"Nevertheless, tell me."

"Shall I? And yet it would be best not. It might inspire a hope that, if it should prove untrue, it had best not lived."

"But tell me. I can bear disappointment better than you think."

"Then—has it ever struck you that there might be just the remotest possibility of your not being Paul Reade's child?"

She started. A swift flush rushed to her cheeks and burned there. She fastened her eyes on the doctor's, burning under the added excitement.

"Oh, if it should be!" she whispered.

"There!" he exclaimed briskly. "I have done wrong to arouse that hope. There are many instances where the child is as unlike the parent as you are unlike yours. You may have inherited from your mother. It was only that thought which suggested the other wild one. I have always been told that my fault was in being unable to hold my imagination in check, and I take it that I have not been misinformed. I am quite convinced that my theory about your mother is correct, but the other is merely a foolish flight of the imagination. Good by. Forget, if you can, that I said that, and bring your friend whenever you choose."

She placed her palm in the hand that he had extended without removing her eyes from his. She heaved a sigh, and then smiled bravely.

"You have given me that which was dead in my breast—hope. Even if it all proved an illusion, I shall still thank you, for I am sure that I can never be as I was when I entered here. Nothing can make me like that again. As soon as Mr. Underwood comes, we will come together to see you. Good by, and God bless you!"

She went down the steps, and he watched her as she disappeared among the trees.

"Poor child!" he said, as he turned and reentered his office. "How she has suffered! I wish she could find that that scoundrel is not her father. What manner of man can he be who would deliberately tell a daughter that that poor old creature down by the lake was her mother? It was a fiendish punishment. I half-believe the wild thought that I suggested to her. I half-believe that he is not her father."

And Marian?

Doctor Judson had forbidden her to think of that which he had told her, and yet it never left her thoughts for one moment, as she followed the path through the trees down to the landing by the lake.

As she passed the little picturesque cottage, she paused and looked at it. How different her feelings were from what they had been when she stood there less than two hours before!

"It is not my mother who lies there, chained like a dog," she whispered, smiling through the grateful tears that filled her eyes. "The blood that flows through those poor veins is not the same that throbs within my body. That awful danger is removed from my life, and it seems to me almost as if nothing can matter now. Oh, if what he said should prove true! Oh, if God would but let me acknowledge another parentage than that of sin and shame! Nothing could be worse; any change must be better. I am like him in no way. I have always hated him, though I never dared own it, even to my own heart. I feel that it is true. I feel that Doctor Judson spoke the truth. Paul Reade is not my father. I know it. I know it."

She had reached the landing, and found Jake sitting on the bank, while the little boat rocked idly in the gentle waves of the tiny lake. He looked at her curiously. How differently she looked from what she had done when he rowed her to that bank such a little while before.

Countrymen are reckoned for their goodness of heart, and not for their breeding, and they rarely hesitate to ask a question when one suggests itself. Certainly Jake did not pause to consider that it was none of his business when he said:

"Did you go to see a friend at the asylum, miss?"

"Yes."

"And you found her better than you expected?"

"Much."

"I thought you did."

"What made you think so?" she asked, placing her hand in his that he might assist her to her seat in the boat.

"Because you looked so white and tired, like as if you was worried, when I took you over; and now—well, I never see such a change in a person in all my born days! There is color in your cheeks, and—'pon my word, you look ten years younger!"

Marian laughed.

"I see you are a good reader of faces," she said kindly. "You are quite right in fancying that I have had good news. I don't think any one ever heard such good news in all the world as I have!"

"I'm glad of that. You looked so pale and unhappy when I rowed you over that my heart ached for you. It did really. I have been a-sittin' on that bank a-whittling and thinking of you ever since I left you there. Say, it wasn't about the old woman in the cottage, was it?"

"She was connected with it," answered Marian evasively. "I thought she might prove to be a relative of mine, but it was not true."

"Great Scott! I should think that would be a relief to you. Poor old soul! Well, miss, I am here, and if you want to go over again you have only to call on Jake. I live at Wildhurst. You are staying there, too; I saw you on the balcony today."

"Thank you, Jake. I have sent for a friend, and when he comes I shall want you to take us both over. If you are not down here I shall ask for you at Wildhurst."

"Thank you, miss."

He took off his old cap to her. She smiled brightly and tripped away.

How different she was from the girl who had come down that path but a few hours previous! There was a song in her heart now—a song that would bubble through her lips—and she paused once and laughed at her own childishness.

"I am hoping too much," she said to herself. "If it should all prove untrue, I should die!"

But she would not allow herself to believe in the possibility. She laughed again and went onward, and a moment later came in contact with the woman whom she had met before leaving Wildhurst.

"We have been looking everywhere for you!" Mrs. King said. "Dinner is over, and Mr. and Mrs. Presbury have feared that you were lost. They came out to look for you; but I rather fancied I knew where you had gone, and sent them back, telling them that I would do it. You have been to the asylum?"

"Yes. The fact is, I forgot all about dinner and that they would be worried about me. It was very good of you to think of it and not allow them to distress themselves."

"But you are hungry now."

"I believe I am," answered Marian, with a little laugh that sounded new to Mrs. King, "but I would not inconvenience them for the world."

"They never consider anything an inconvenience. They will like to oblige you in any way that is possible. I wonder if you would allow me to go in and sit with you while you eat?"

There was something in the wistful countenance that strangely touched Marian. She had felt the influence of this woman before, but it was upon her now in a greater degree. She felt hope swelling in her heart to such an extent that sadness in any countenance was pitiful to her, but there was something beyond that in this one. She put out her hand and grasped the other almost tenderly.

"Do come!" she exclaimed, with a winning smile. It will be so good of you. I feel like a naughty child that ought to be punished, and you will save me from it."

Mrs. King smiled in return. She did not release the hand that had been extended to her, but drew it closer within her own.

"You look so much happier than when you left me on the balcony," she said wistfully. "Has the sight of those poor creatures filled you with thanksgiving that you are not of their number?"

Marian hesitated. The woman's influence was still moving her with force. She looked into the gentle face for a moment; then answered:

"It has aroused—hope! Oh, I can't tell you; but that visit has opened a prospect to me that seems like—heaven! Can you understand how a person would think that the greatest good that could happen her in life would be to find herself without the parent that she had considered hers through all the years of her life?"

Mrs. King started. The hand which held Marian's trembled violently. She did not speak at once, and when she did, her voice was hoarse past recognition.

"Yes; I can understand," she answered.

CHAPTER XXXI.

MARION FINDS HER MOTHER.

A silence fell upon the two women that neither of them seemed capable of breaking. They stood there under the trees for a moment; then Mrs. King, still holding Marian's hand, led her to the house and into the dining-room.

The dinner which Mrs. Presbury had kept warm for her guest was served—a simple dinner, but of such excellent quality that the greatest connoisseur would have found no fault with it, and for the first time in weeks Marian found herself with an appetite such as she had indulged in happier days.

Mrs. King sat and watched her with a singular smile upon her lips, scarcely understanding her own sensations in presence of the girl whom, but a few hours before, she did not even know.

She thought it was fascination, springing from the girlish presence, an association which it had been long since she had known. She believed it was the sweet, airy, cool and soothing personality of the girl that appealed to her, and her heart beat as it had not done in many weary years as the dear eyes ever and anon rested on hers.

She did not know exactly what Marian was talking about, and it is doubtful if Marian did either; but she chatted on, as does a happy child under the influence of strong excitement.

And how strange it seemed to her to have something of that awful burden lifted! She had not paused to think of it. It was only the radiant glare of hope that was illuminating her life to such brightness that it was almost impossible for her to see mentally. She was blinded and bewildered by the sudden effulgence that had been shed upon her soul, and she wanted to take the whole world into her embrace and make it her confidant, as the baby girl takes the kitten into her delighted arms and tells it of the happiness that has come into the little life.

She was becoming almost hysterical as her meal proceeded, and, observing it, Mrs. King rose and poured out a glass of wine from the decanter upon the buffet.

"Drink that," she said, with some authority; and without questioning, Marion swallowed it.

When she had finished she rose from the table, and again extending her hand to Mrs. King, she exclaimed:

"Come and let us walk, will you not? I feel as if inactivity would suffocate me. I must seem a crazy thing to you; but the most extraordinary thing has happened to me, that if it should prove true, I should be the happiest girl in the whole world. Perhaps I may tell you what it is some time, if you care to listen."

Mrs. King took the hand, and leaning forward kissed the fair young cheek.

"If you knew how much good it does me to see some one happy, to have some fair young thing about me so full of life and hope as you are, you would not think it necessary to find excuses," she said, with tears standing in her wistful eyes. "Why, child, it has been years and years since I have seen the shadow of a smile upon any face. It has been years and years since I have held a human hand in mine. My lips have forgotten how to kiss.

"I believed my heart had forgotten how to love, and yet, not having known you a day, I already love you. A little week ago I had believed that life and hope were alike dead to me, and yet in those few short days all have been born again. I can understand your excitement, for the same miracle that has been worked for you has been worked for me, only that I am old, and the enthusiasm of youth has burned out. Perhaps when you tell me the story that has made you so happy today, I shall tell you the one of my life, and we may give each other the sympathy that both are craving.

They kissed each other, those two women who had suffered so much, the one in so short a time and the other during long years of silent torture, and went out into the hall.

It was growing rather late in the afternoon, and there were long stretches of shadow made by the trees in the park.

"It is the loveliest hour of the day," Marian said, as she drew her new friend toward the open door. "Come, let us enjoy it."

They were about to pass out, when Marian saw some one entering. It was a man, and recognizing Underwood, she sprang forward and caught his hand.

"Have you received my telegram so soon?" she asked eagerly. "Oh, it was good of you to come. It was like you to lose no time?"

"Telegram!" he repeated. "What telegram?"

"You did not get it, then?"

"No. I have received no message from you. I came because there was that which I had to say which could not be written? Has something happened? You look as if heaven had opened for you."

"And I think it has. Allow me to introduce you to a new friend, Mrs. King. You will excuse us for a few minutes, will you not, Mrs. King?"

The elder woman bowed and pressed the fingers which were extended to her, then she left them. Marian again turned to Underwood.

"Come out into the park, under the trees," she exclaimed, unable to control the joy in her voice. "Somehow I feel as if my soul could not bear the confinement of rooms. You have been so good to me that perhaps I am presuming too much in thinking that you will rejoice with me in this, and help me to prove that it is all true; but I can't believe it. You know it is human nature to expect more from those who have already given."

She laughed as the words left her lips, a sweet, ringing laugh, and Underwood looked down upon her, surprised at the increase in her beauty, delighted with the dainty ringing sound that he had never heard before.

He drew her hand through his arm with a protecting gesture, and led her out to a rustic seat beneath a tree where they would be unobserved. They were surrounded by shrubbery, half-enclosed in one of Nature's own domiciles.

"Why, you are quite excited," he said gently to her. "Something most extraordinary must have occurred. Now tell me what it is. You know that you can depend upon me."

She sat down and looked up at him.

"Yes, I feel that in every corner of my heart," she answered with filling eyes. "I want to try to be consecutive if I can, and in order to do that, I must begin back and tell you of everything that has occurred before. This morning it would have been impossible to me; but now, with this sweet hope that has been born in my soul, I can do it without a shadow of hesitation. If, in my excitement, I grow incoherent, don't fail to stop me, and don't hesitate in asking any question that you may desire."

But he interrupted her very little as she told the story from beginning to end. He let her tell it in her own way; but as she proceeded he took her hand in his to give her strength and courage to continue. She, understanding, answered him with a smile.

"And Doctor Judson, you tell me, is quite sure that it is impossible for your father not to have assumed the name of Morris in going there?" he asked, when she paused in the recital.

"Quite certain. He knows the address of Ezra

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

IT'S rather a serious matter to decide which of two poems will appeal to the greater number of readers, "Laddie of Mine," with special Memorial Day significance, or the poem for Mothers' Day, and all other days as well. First the decision would rest with one, then with the other until at last a compromise was effected and both poems used, and which appear on another page. We have to thank for these, Clara Miehm, Detroit, Mich., writer of "Laddie of Mine," and Mrs. Ezra Paddock, New York (postmark blurred and address not given), for the Mother poem, author unknown.—Ed.

WOODBRIDGE, Box 297, N. J.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I cannot recall having seen any letters from New Jersey. I wonder is it because no COMFORT sisters live in my dear old state?

I am a trained nurse and graduated from one of the best training schools in the country in 1914. I have taken COMFORT for quite a few years and have found it all that its name implies. I especially like the Sisters' Corner. Much that is interesting and enlightening can be found here. Next, great-hearted Uncle Charlie when he was among us and Uncle Lisha who succeeded him.

I have always held COMFORT in high esteem and for the fine moral fiber on which it is so well builded. I have taken many magazines, some of the highest priced ones in the country, and in such magazines one would naturally expect the best, but in nearly every one I have found defects. But to my way of judging a magazine COMFORT has none. I always find its fiction clean, its information on various subjects of the best, its advice and counsel of the different departments all that one could require. In fact it is a paper to inspire, to teach, to help, and to guide, and I would challenge any one to say otherwise. When you buy COMFORT you are not paying for costly paper and gayly colored pictures. You are getting good, clean, sensible articles, the real life of any magazine. Even in its method of getting subscriptions, the crippled and helpless are not forgotten. Can you show me any other magazine that does likewise? I have yet to find one.

I am an American, single, and was born in Woodbridge twenty-seven years ago last October. I have dark brown hair, dark blue eyes and medium complexion. I am five feet three inches and weigh about 120 pounds.

In my spare time I love to read and study. Since graduating I have bought and studied a great many post-graduate books. I have my special hobby outside of my beloved work. Can I tell all of you about it and perhaps get you interested in my behalf? In fact I would give a very great deal to get every COMFORT reader interested in this desire of mine. Since 1917 I have been collecting pictures of the World War. Today I have about 7,000—all told—pictures that are wonderful and of course most interesting. They include soldiers of every rank of every country involved in the war, and of every action in connection with the war.

You cannot realize how difficult it has been for me to gather these pictures of scenes and situations which have passed with the passing of the war and which will recede farther and farther into the past until even the memory of them is gone. Today attics and storerooms of hundreds of homes are piled high with these precious old papers. Would you all give me a little help? Any kind of picture is acceptable, so long as it pertains to the war or had any connection with it.

IN all recipes calling for baking powder, insure successful results by using Royal Baking Powder (absolutely pure).

It is conceded by domestic science teachers and baking experts the world over to be "the most healthful and dependable baking powder made." Royal contains no alum.

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

LEFT-OVER recipes are always good and you will particularly like the meat rolls that are illustrated in this column, together with recipe. And to sort of "tone up" the humble left-overs are rhubarb and spring greens recipes that have a toning-up effect on the system and are better tonics than can be bought at drug stores, besides being much more pleasant to "take." Different ways of preparing the greens in your locality would be helpful for there are many people who do not know that the most common kind of weeds, when properly prepared, are edible and delicious. Won't you send in your favorite recipe?—Ed.

A GOOD SUPPER DISH.—One-half pound macaroni, cook in boiling, salted water until soft. Put layer in buttered baking dish, cover with layer of meat, one-half pound of this, either fresh or left-over, over this sprinkle a little grated cheese, repeat until ingredients are used up, and over all pour one can of tomato soup. Sprinkle thick layer of bread- or cracker-crumbs over top and cook one-half hour in moderate oven.—MRS. M., Dresden, Maine.

LEFT-OVER MEAT AND MASHED POTATOES.—Cover the bottom of a greased baking dish with hot mashed potatoes, add a thick layer of pieces of roast beef cut in small pieces, season well with salt, pepper and a little onion juice, and moisten with some of the gravy left over from the hot roast, and cover with a thin layer of mashed potatoes. Bake in a hot oven until well heated and the top is a good brown color.

MEAT SOUFFLE.—This can be made of any left-over meat, or even two kinds of meat, to make one cupful when finely chopped. Make a sauce of one cup of hot milk thickened with one tablespoon of flour, one tablespoon of butter and seasoned with salt and pepper. To this add the chopped meat, and one-quarter cup bread-crumbs. Remove from fire, let cool a little, add beaten yolk of one egg and then the stiffly-beaten whites of two eggs. Put into buttered baking dish and bake half an hour in moderate oven. Serve as soon as cooked, before it has time to cool.—MRS. C., Augusta, Maine.

MEAT ROLLS.—Sift together two cups of sifted flour, three-fourths teaspoon of salt, and two teaspoons of baking powder. Work into this two rounding tablespoons of shortening until the mixture is like a meal.

MEAT ROLLS.

As flour varies, it is difficult to give the exact amount of liquid, but it will require from two-thirds to three-fourths of a cup of cold milk, or mixed milk and water may be used. Add the liquid gradually and distribute it evenly while mixing that no portion of the flour may become over-wet. Turn the dough out onto a slightly floured board and very lightly form into a ball without kneading. Roll one-third of an inch thick, cut into five-inch squares and brush with melted butter. Have ready a meat mixture made as follows: Put a beefsteak cut through the food chopper, add a grating of onion, salt and pepper, and lightly fry in a little beef fat previously tried out, tossing continuously while cooking. Cook about the same as hamburg steak, then cool. Make into small rolls, and wrap with the squares of dough, buttered side next to the meat. Place well apart on a shallow tin and bake in a hot oven until a golden brown. This is an excellent way to use left-overs of meat and fish but care must be taken not to make the mixture too wet.

RHUBARB MARMALADE.—Boil slowly until thick two quarts rhubarb, cut into small pieces, six cups of sugar and the rind and pulp of half a dozen large oranges.

MEAT TURNOVERS.—Chop the meat. If the quantity on hand is small, mix with it left-over potato or rice. Season with salt, pepper, onion, etc. Place filling on circular pieces of biscuit dough about the size of a saucer. Fold over the dough and crimp edges together. Bake for about one-half hour in a hot oven. A brown sauce made from two tablespoons flour browned in two tablespoons of butter or other fat, to which a cup of water or stock and one-half teaspoon of salt is added, may be served with turnovers. —MRS. C. L., Millinocket, Maine.

POTATO SCALLOP.—In a greased baking dish arrange alternate layers of cold sliced potatoes, probably three or four cupfuls, cold boiled onions, a little finely-chopped green and red peppers, one-half of each. Season with salt and pepper, add enough milk to cover potatoes and cook one hour. This is a good way to use up left-over onions and potatoes.

CREAMED SPINACH.—Make a plain milk gravy of one cup of milk thickened with a little flour, and salt and pepper to taste, one heaping tablespoon of butter and a very little sugar. To this add one quart of cooked spinach, and just before serving put slices of hard-boiled egg over top of spinach.

ALBERT CAKES.—Line tins with plain pastry rolled very thin. Into each put one tablespoon of jelly or thick jam. Fill each tin two-thirds full of cake mixture, cross the top with two very thin even strips of pastry and bake in a moderately hot oven until they shrink from the tins.

DANDELIONS.—Wash thoroughly, remove roots, and cook until tender in boiling salted water. Allow two quarts of water to one peck of dandelions. Season with butter, salt and pepper to taste.—MRS. L. E. H., New Hampshire.

RHUBARB AND ORANGE DESSERT.—Two pounds of rhubarb, two oranges, one and three-quarters cup of sugar, one cup chopped nuts, and one tablespoon gelatine. Peel the oranges and cut into small pieces and mix with the rhubarb that has been cut into small pieces, cover with sugar and bake until rhubarb is tender; dissolve the gelatine in a little water, stir into rhubarb and orange mixture, add the chopped nuts and pour into moulds. Let stand until cold and hardened. Serve with whipped cream.

RHUBARB TAPIOCA PUDDING.—Two-thirds cup tapioca, one and one-quarter cup boiling water, three cups rhubarb, one and one-half cup sugar, two-thirds teaspoon salt. Unless minute tapioca is used, which requires but little cooking, soak the tapioca several hours. Drain, put in double boiler, add boiling water and cook until tapioca has absorbed the water. Peel rhubarb, cut in small pieces, add to tapioca with sugar and cook until soft. Serve with cream and sugar.—MRS. L. E. H., Manchester, N. H.

BAKED RHUBARB.—Wash rhubarb, peel, cut into small pieces; slice three bananas and arrange layers of rhubarb and bananas in buttered baking dish, covering each layer with sugar, until probably three cups of sugar are used. Dot each layer of rhubarb with small pieces of butter. Cover and bake in slow oven two hours.—E. H. B., Maine.

RHUBARB PIE.—One and one-half pints of rhubarb, two cups of sugar, butter size of egg, three crackers rolled fine, and one egg well beaten. Stir all together and put into pie crusts. Raisins or slices of bananas added to this are very good.

CREAM CAKES.—To one cup of hot water, add one half cup of butter or butter substitute, and half a teaspoon of salt. Bring to a boil and then add one and one-half cups of pastry flour and stir well for fully five minutes. When the mixture is nearly cold, add five eggs, one at a time, without beating. After the last egg is added, stir hard that the eggs may be thoroughly incorporated. Drop in rounding teaspoonfuls on a buttered tin, some distance apart, and bake twenty-five minutes, or until well puffed and brown.

CREAM CAKES.

FILLING.—Bring two cups of milk to a boil and thicken with two tablespoons of corn-starch wet with a little cold milk. Cook slowly ten minutes. Beat two eggs until light, add two-thirds of a cup of sugar, and one teaspoon of butter. Pour milk into egg mixture, return to kettle and cook five minutes. Flavor when cold. Split cakes and fill.

CAKE MIXTURE.—Cream together half a cup each sugar and strained honey and one heaping tablespoon of butter. Add one well-beaten egg, a grating of nutmeg and one cup of flour sifted with one rounding teaspoon of baking powder.

For the country mother I have a few words to say. You who live at a great distance from a doctor often find yourself in a terrifying situation with a young child in convulsions on your hands. Many diseases which start in an adult with a chill, commence in children with convulsions. Among these diseases are scarlet fever, measles, smallpox and pneumonia. Convulsions, however, most frequently occur from irritation of some portion of the intestinal tract, as in teething, intestinal worms, and indigestible articles of diet. A possible attack of convulsions is preceded by restlessness during sleep for a day or two, the eyes being partly opened, with more or less grating of the teeth, and sudden starting when touched as if very frightened. The child is cross and changes color often. Convulsions are more liable to appear in that period to and during the cutting of the first teeth. A long-drawn, deep breath indicates the termination of the spasm, and if the child sleeps naturally for some time after this, he will not be as likely to have a return, as if the sleep is broken, accompanied by twitching of the limbs.

This is a condition that the mother can treat until she can get the doctor. The first thing to do is to give an enema to which has been added a little salt or vinegar. While this is being done, some water should be made hot, and a soft cotton bed sheet wrung from it, carefully wrapped around the child's whole body, and outside of this wrap a warm woolen blanket. Be very careful lest the water be too hot and seriously burn the child's tender skin; first test the water by holding your elbow in it—the elbow is very sensitive to heat and therefore is a good temperature tester. Apply chipped ice or cloths wring out of ice water, to the head; and plain mustard drafts to the nape of the neck and the calves of the legs. If the bowels do not move in a little time, repeat the enema. Continue the cold to the head and change the sheet every half hour for a couple of hours (careful the water is not hot enough to burn the skin), then wipe the skin dry and put on dry warmed clothing. In the meantime get in touch with your doctor who will prescribe the medicine needed.

I would like to hear from every reader of the COMFORT Family—sisters, brothers and cousins.

Sincerely yours,
MISS CATHRINE M. JACKSON.

Miss Jackson.—It has always been the aim of the owner, editor, and everyone connected with COMFORT, to make it just what you so kindly say it means to you. I do wish you'd give us more valuable information along the lines of your work. It would mean so much, maybe the saving of a life, to those who live a long distance from a doctor. I hope you get hundreds of pictures.—Ed.

DEAR SISTERS AND MRS. W:

I am going to put my letter in a very bright envelope so Mrs. W. will be sure to see it and let me into the Sisters' Corner. I come with a request. Do any of the sisters know where I can get the book, "Nannock Igelow:" or, "Life in the White Bear's Den?"

I have read COMFORT since I was a very little girl and Mother and I nearly scrap over it when I get it out of the post office. I come down the street reading and sometimes I bump into people. Are you shocked at my street manners? Well, you needn't be for if I don't look at it on the street I won't get it for hours after I get home for Mother reads slowly and makes a good thing last longer but I just simply devour it.

When I was about seven years old I wrote a letter to COMFORT and told you all how to make a pie. I told Mother to be sure and mail it but that letter went where my letters to Santa Claus went—in her box of keepsakes. How indignant I was when I discovered it!

I am five feet, eight inches tall, weigh 104 pounds, and have dark brown hair and eyes. I am seventeen years old and was married the 11th of last January.

I'll sign my real name and not as some do, a nom de plume.

MRS. N. A. HAWKES.

Mrs. Hawkes.—Your mother deserves a scolding for keeping that perfectly good recipe from us. Anyway, you did the best you could.—Ed.

BURGETTSTOWN, PA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL THE COMFORT FAMILY:

I have come all the way up from Penn's Woods to see you and please let me sit over there by "Old Maid" of the January COMFORT. I think she is a near relative of mine, related by experience. I hope if I don't see her that she will write again and tell us of her experiences "Over There." I still have an interest in a piece of French soil, and would like to hear from her.

How many of the sisters ever try pasting a piece of velvet in the heels of slippers to prevent "railroads" in stockings? The velvet keeps the shoe from slipping up and down and saves the wear on the hose.

If the sisters care to know, I will if they write me tell them how I cured myself of catarrh in an easy and inexpensive way.

How many of you keep a supply of mustard plasters on hand? A box filled with the ingredients used in making plasters can be kept in the cabinet and is always ready except to add warm water to make a paste. Put flour, mustard and ginger in the proportions required and put away. If the patient is rubbed with a little vaseline before the plaster is placed in position no blisters will form. This saves putting the oil or lard in with the flour, etc., and it will keep an indefinite time. If the plaster "material" is sprinkled on a thick slice of damp bread it will act quicker as the bread keeps the heat in.

Now may I ask for some suggestions? Will someone tell me how to care for hyacinths? I have never tried to raise them before but I like them so well I am going to attempt them this year.

Why don't the sisters tell us something about themselves beside their height, etc., for instance:—favorite flower, color, books, and any hobby they may have.

I like shades of brown, and green and gold. My choice of all flowers is the "sweet-brier rose," the dearest, loveliest flower that grows. And if I have a hobby at all it is amateur photography. Anyone want to exchange pictures?

Sisters, I love you all, so look for your letters anxiously.

Your Pennsylvania Sister,
MISS I. LEVITHA EMLER.

Miss Emler.—You will save yourself much work by sending the catarrh remedy to me to be printed in COMFORT for you'll be sure to get requests for it.—Ed.

LEWISBURG, KY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I come this morning to talk about Christmas presents and it is none too early for the woman of limited time and means, if she is to make them. I read a letter some time ago wherein a sister asked what to give to men in the way of home-made articles.

I find that a crocheted collar box, made with two colors of thread, would be acceptable and a crocheted tie rack is also good. A laundry bag, embroidered with monogram or initial, would be convenient.

I have a large number of friends to remember at Christmas and as my purse is not very fat I always make most of the presents. For the woman I make crocheted collars and buy towels and either tat or embroider an edge on them, and maybe embroider an initial, and I have a very pretty and useful gift. Many are the ways to make pincushions and they are always useful.

For the children I make home-made dogs from a pattern I have. I made one for my little brother of a fleece lined stocking, turned wrong side out and with a little fur on its neck and on the tip of its turned up tail. He looks like a sure-enough poodle.

The handwoven, hot dish mats make a very acceptable gift to every housewife.

I am five feet, four inches tall, have dark hair and eyes and weigh 120 pounds. I have been married eight years.

Your COMFORT Sister, MABEL JANE.

MISSISSIPPI.

DEAR READERS:

Please Mrs. Wilkinson, let me in. You will get rid of me then.

No use for me to praise our COMFORT for the large number of readers know that it is the best to be had, regardless of cost. There are many higher priced magazines that do not contain half as much as "our" paper.

Through our department I've made some nice pen friends. I'm not going to ask that any of you write to me directly (Mrs. Wilkinson has my address) for while I'd appreciate the letters very much I would not be able to answer all as postage stamps are scarce with me most of the time, to say nothing of the time it would take.

This is the 9th of November and we haven't had a killing frost yet. Just now through this section farmers are busy making molasses from sugar cane. I wish there was room to tell you just how it is done but we haven't the space for the details.

How many of the sisters attend the movies? I go once in a while. I cannot get into town very often then after I do I cannot afford the price of a ticket only at times. I try to see the best plays, as I prefer those that are inspiring and uplifting. There are many shown that are a disgrace to humanity, and are not fit for grownups much less children and young folks. I believe much good could be obtained from good plays.

Here's a topic worthy of discussion, I think. Why the double standard? One for man, another for woman? I've heard men and women condemn others when deep down in their hearts they weren't half so good as their tongue's target. God has only one standard and all must measure up to it. No woman ever fell so low but what some man fell also, but the man can go on and he is called Mr. So-and-so, while the poor girl or woman, sometimes with a babe in arms, is cast out and shunned.

I hope August Trick reads our corner. I think you are a nice fellow.

I'm most thirty years old, and curl my hair, use cream and powder on my face, but Nature has provided me with rouge. I think some people should use rouge, and most men powder their faces. When I hear people condemn a girl because she powders her face I wonder to myself if they haven't done worse than that. My hubby spends more in one week for tobacco than powder would cost me in a year's time. Powder doesn't smell as badly as tobacco nor is it injurious to one's health.

Good by to everyone. WELL WISHER.

TENNESSEE.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have read COMFORT many years and now come to the sisters for advice as I am greatly troubled and worried. My boy has gone wrong with a young girl and thinks he will have to marry her as she is under age and so is he. This is what I want to ask. Should I treat her as one of the family or scorn her and never have anything to do with her? Now what is the way for a mother to treat that kind of a girl? She has always been a nice girl and well thought of up to this time. I don't know whether the boy cares enough about her to marry her and live with her or not, for he won't say.

I will be thankful for any advice from the sisters. Will leave my address with Mrs. Wilkinson.

A WORRIED MOTHER.

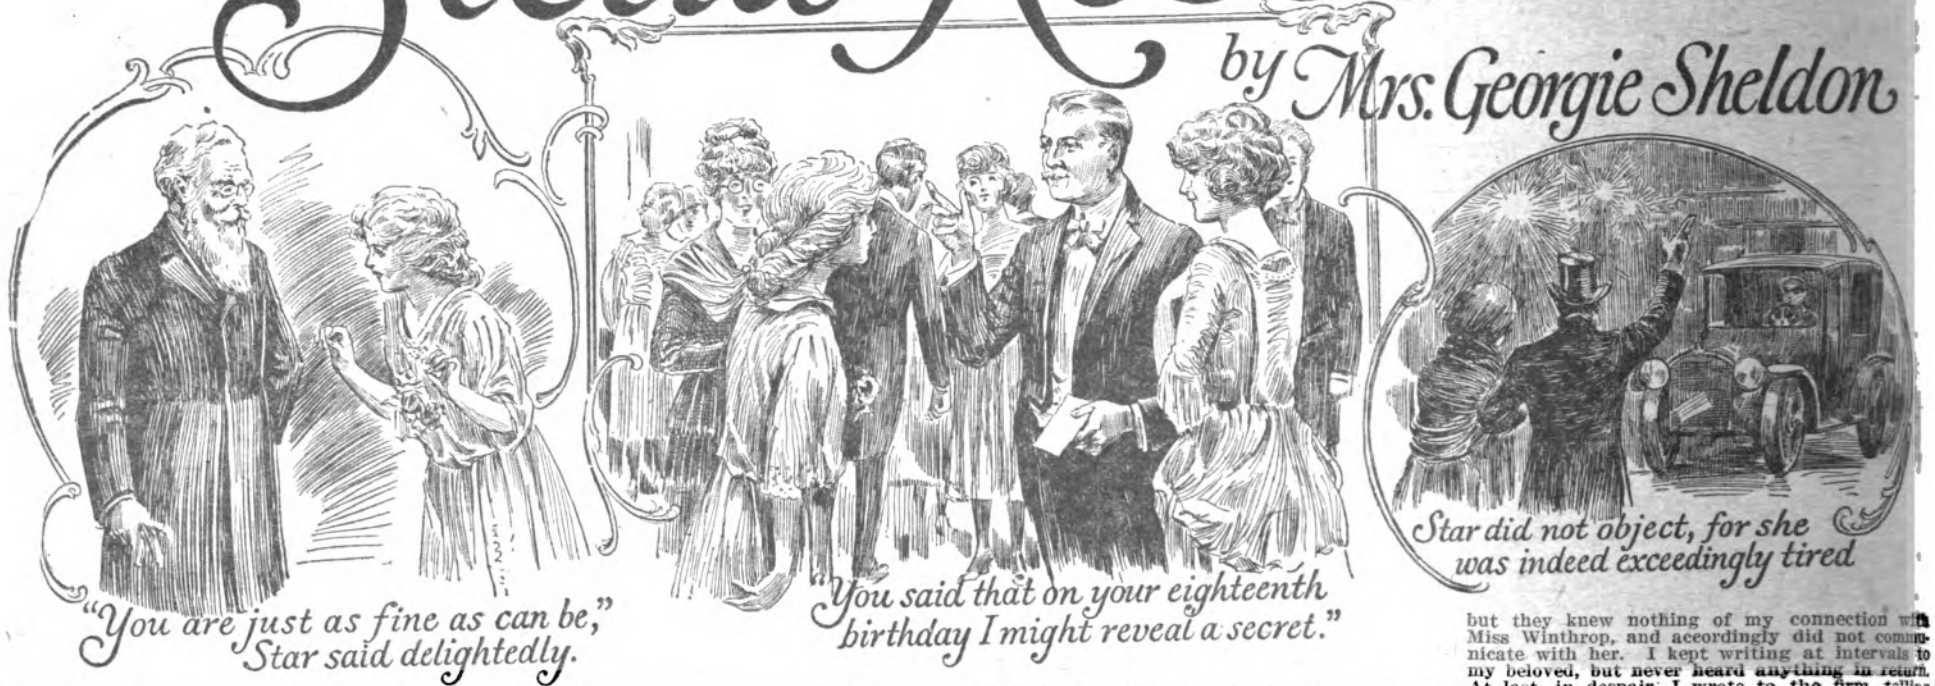
Worried Mother.—It seems that a mother should treat "that kind of a girl" just as she would treat "that kind of a boy" and if you scorn her and never have anything to do with her, as you suggest, you should use your son the same way.—Ed.

KOSSUTH, MISS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Will you allow another farm woman to chat with you a while? I will write about flowers as they are my heart's delight. I love flowers of all kinds and potted plants are my choice. I had over three hundred potted plants last year and fifty of that number were coleus, the briercrest and sunset shade, or rainbow coleus as some call them. I had some fine ones, with some leaves as large as dinner plates. I grew them in rich soil with plenty of water and sunlight as they do not thrive in shady places. I made my porch boxes all around the porch and filled them with good rich soil, one-third good garden loam, one-third leaf mold or chip dirt and one-third sand. I planted geraniums very close together and bordered the boxes, every inch apart, with Wandering Jew (four kinds), a trailing coleus and sleeping sea moss, which grows several feet long and resembles the finest ferns. Its fronds are as long as one's arm and resemble fine feathers. It is very strange and odd, for at sundown it droops its feathery foliage and clings close to the stem; at sunrise it spreads out its foliage and seems to have real life. I have all kinds and colors of geraniums, the American Beauty and the blue geraniums are beautiful planted in a tub in a circle with a double white geranium for the center. It then has the national colors. I also have the blue rose and expect to make an umbrella trellis for it. As some of you may not understand what I mean by this, it will be a post ten feet high with a frame like an umbrella for the climbing rose to cover. I love roses and have many kinds, one a giant pink, with buds as large as a goblet and the open flower is over six inches across. The flower stems are long and stiff with large foliage. Roses and other flowers thrive when soot from the stovepipe is stirred around the roots and mixed well with the soil. I have another lovely plant called the Christ Crown and the thorns are like needles. The plant has lovely pink, waxy blossoms. It is claimed to be the same plant that was used to plait the crown that was placed on the Savior's head when crucified and it is just like the pictures shown in the Bible.

I have the blue, white, pink and blood red hydrangeas. They are so pretty with their large heads of flowers, some of them larger than gallon buckets. To be successful with them, give them a large pot and good rich soil.



I want a cocoanut tree and shall try to find one, also a pineapple. If some of the sisters can tell me where to get them I would be very glad. I am trying to get one tropical plant of each kind of fruit that grows as it helps to educate my children (Mildred, fourteen, and Elland, eleven). I have banana trees, also oranges and lemons and children from several miles around come to see my banana trees. I've heard them say: "I used to read about banana trees but never thought I would ever see one."

I have a plant home, 15x24 feet, to keep all my plants in, and an oil heater to use in very cool weather. Every farm should have a plant house as it

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

A terrible storm at sea and from a steamer running between Liverpool and New York is Stella Rosevelt Gladstone, an orphan, on her way to distant relatives in New York. She is befriended by Jacob Rosevelt, who is startled when he learns her mother called her "Star," her grandmother giving her the name. A fire breaks out and the boats are rapidly filled. Stella refuses to go unless room is made for Mr. Rosevelt, who the next day suffers from an ill turn and is carefully nursed by her. The sixth day they are rescued. Mr. Rosevelt is told of the care Stella gave him during his illness and while thanking her a young man approaches and Mr. Rosevelt introduces Archibald Sherbrooke, whose home is in Derbyshire where Star's father preached. Star's shawl becomes loosened and not finding the pin, Mr. Sherbrooke draws one, an exquisitely carved stone, from his necktie, and Stella pins the shawl and then tells the story of the wreck and her endeavor to save Mr. Rosevelt's life. Arriving in New York, Mr. Sherbrooke places a card in her hand with his address upon it. Stella, remembering the pin, passes it to him. He begs her to keep it as a souvenir. Wishing she had something to give, he will accept a lock of her hair. Stella is met by Mrs. Blunt, Mrs. Richards' housekeeper, who hurries her away. Stella receives a cool reception from her aunt, who had written she would befriend and educate Stella until able to care for herself, and learns she is to be degraded to the level of a common servant. She asks her aunt if her father, from what she wrote him, had any idea she was to come into the family as a servant. Mrs. Richards does not relent, and Stella appeals to Mr. Richards, giving him the letter written by her father to Mrs. Richards and her reply. Stella has one hundred pounds. Could she not use it and then teach, relieving his wife of all responsibility? Mrs. Richards is surprised at Stella's suggestion and Mr. Richards makes arrangements for her to attend a select school, she giving a part of each day to household work. Stella wins, at commencement, a part in the class exercises and surprises Mr. Richards by her instrumental music, essay and promotion to the senior class. Josephine, admiring the cameo worn by Stella suggests she give it to her, as her wardrobe does not correspond with it. Going to Stella's room and finding the cameo, Josephine takes it and discovers the initials "A. S." Stella misses the cameo and is suspicious who has it. In the meanwhile Mr. Richards receives a letter from Mrs. Richards' Uncle Jacob. He has lost all, is penniless and will accept the home that was offered him when rich. Mrs. Richards refuses to receive him, the house is full, and Mr. Richards is left troubled. Upon his arrival he is taken to the Lodge to sleep, Mr. Rosevelt meets Star who offers her room to him and does all she can to brighten his life. Mrs. Richards receives him coldly, and Josephine ignores her uncle. Mrs. Richards and Josephine go to Long Branch where they meet Lord Carroll, of Carrolton, Derbyshire, England, who appears pleased with Josephine and requests permission of her mother to call. Noticing a ring Josephine wears and examining it he sees the initials "A. S." Josephine claims it is given by a relative. Lord Carrol cannot understand it. The next day he leaves for New York. Stella, hurrying to take a train for home, and in danger, is stopped by Archibald Sherbrooke and the acquaintance renewed. Stella tells him that she and Mr. Rosevelt are in the same home. Mr. Rosevelt goes to New York with Stella to call upon Mr. Sherbrooke in his studio and arranges a pleasure trip for them to Coney Island for the following day. When they return from it Stella is the promised wife of Archibald Sherbrooke. Lord Carrol, of Carrolton, thought to be Josephine's betrothed, is expected. Stella sees in him her promised husband, Archibald Sherbrooke. She passes a sleepless night. Walking to the lodge, she meets Archibald, and he cannot understand why he finds her there. Believing he is acting a part, for he wins her love as Archibald Sherbrooke, he appears as Lord Carrol of Carrolton, the expected husband of her cousin, and refusing his explanation she bids him go back to Josephine and ask her for the cameo he gave her. Archibald seeks Mr. Richards' confidence and explains his position, his meeting Star on the steamer, his interest in her and later her promised husband, his ignorance that she is an inmate of this house, his meeting Stella and her refusal to listen to him. Mrs. Richards, overhearing his story and determined that her plans shall not fail, seeks Stella in the lodge, where she has gone for sympathy from Mr. Rosevelt. She upbraids Stella for conducting herself in a shameless manner, misconstruing Lord Carrol's attentions and accusing him with unfaithfulness. Stella is crushed with shame and humiliation, and the next morning Mr. Rosevelt and Stella go to New York where they make their home. Lord Carrol leaves a note for Josephine requesting her to send the cameo to his address that he may return it to the owner should he be so happy as to find her. Stella graduates with honor from the Normal College and Mr. Appleton introduces her as the author of "Chatsworth's Pride."

CHAPTER XXIII.

AN INTERESTING STORY.

JACOB Rosevelt stood not far away during the conversation between Mr. Appleton, Miss Meredith and Star, and a proud light beamed in his eyes as he listened to their praises of the girl whom he had learned to love so well.

But it was nothing new to him that Star was an authoress; he had known it for nearly a year.

That was the secret that she had whispered in his ear when, after Mrs. Richards' terrible accusations, they had been left alone and she had begged him to go away with her to make a little home of their own, telling him that what she should receive for her book, together with her hundred pounds, would be ample for their support until she could graduate and obtain a position as a teacher.

She had written it that first winter; for after Mr. Richards had vetoed his wife's plan of making her a [illegible] and insisted that she should be sent to school, there had been many lonely hours which would have been very irksome to her if she had not spent them in this way.

When she was shown into Mr. Appleton's office and made known her errand there, he looked at her in wonder, astonished at the temerity of one so young and simple as she appeared to be in bringing her manuscript to him and asking him to publish it.

But he became strangely interested in it at once, and read on and on, now with smiles, then melting into tears, until it was finished, and pronounced a "little gem"; while he was convinced that a sensitive, refined and talented girl had thrown her heart, and perhaps something of her own life, into those touching pages.

He was greatly interested in her, and told her that he should publish her book, and if the first edition sold well, she should have a thousand dollars, and a certain per cent. on all other editions.

It seemed like a fortune to Star, who had not thought of receiving anything like such a sum, and she went back to her duties with a joyful heart to await the issue of her book.

Mr. Appleton was so pleased with her that he saw her often after that, and having received a card from her for the commencement exercises of Professor Roberts' seminary, he decided he would go; and the little package which he had given her in the presence of Mr. Richards was a copy of her book, which had just come to him from the hands of the binders; and it was he, too, who, admiring her fine essay, begged it of her and sent it, with those few flattering remarks which had so annoyed Josephine, to the next morning's papers.

Star had put no name to her work, telling Mr. Appleton that she did not care to be known as its author; and he, too, thought it best, since it was her first experience in literary matters; so, when she had told him that her name was Stella, he had put a simple Star in place of it.

But the book had sold beyond even the publisher's most sanguine expectations, and when it became evident very soon that a second edition must be published, he asked her to allow him to put her name to it, as everybody was besieging him to know who wrote it.

But she was firm, and insisted upon having his promise that he would not betray her until after her graduation and her eighteenth birthday.

When he wrote her a check for the promised thousand dollars, she had taken it directly to Mr. Rosevelt.

"Now we need have no fears for the future," she said, with a proud smile, as she put it into his hand. "You must have every comfort, Uncle Jacob—fruits, and wines, and everything nice, to make you strong and well. There will be more coming, you know, as the other editions are sold, and when I begin to teach I shall have my salary besides."

The old gentleman was deeply touched by her thoughtfulness for him; he could not speak for the choking sensation in his throat, but drew her gently to him and kissed her fair forehead, feeling that she was the only gleam of sunshine which his life contained.

Now, as he stood by and heard her praises sung, and knew that she would have the fame that belonged to her, he exulted over it; and when, a little later, she came to him and slipped an envelope into his hand, saying: "It is another check, Uncle Jacob, which Mr. Appleton has just given to me. Please take care of it, for you are my banker, you know; and," a tear starting to her glorious eyes, "I believe I never expected to be so happy again as I am tonight," he thought his own cup of joy was nearly as full as hers.

She was, indeed, a star after that all through the evening, and held a right royal little court, receiving and making the acquaintance of the admirers of "Chatsworth's Pride," until she became so weary that she longed to get home to quiet and rest.

As soon as she could find an opportunity to do so, she drew Mr. Rosevelt to President Hunter and made her adieu.

Just as she was turning away some one touched her on the arm.

"Miss Gladstone, allow me to present my brother, Mr. Ralph Meredith."

It was Miss Meredith—Grace Meredith, she had told Star she was called—who spoke, and looking up, she found a pair of brilliant dark eyes looking into hers, a handsome face smiling down upon her, while a musical voice acknowledged the introduction with evident pleasure.

"I expect you are the 'star' whom I have been wishing to know for a long time," he said, significantly, as he took the hand she held out to him, and thought he had never seen a lovelier face in his life.

Star thanked him with a charming smile for his interest in her, and introduced him to Mr. Rosevelt; then turned to Miss Meredith to escape from the praises which she saw he was longing to pour into her ears.

The young man was somewhat chagrined at being thus summarily disposed of, but he was too polite and good-natured to betray it, and did his best to make himself agreeable to the old gentleman and win his good will.

Gradually, however, he managed to attract the attention of the young ladies, and then the conversation became general until Mr. Rosevelt declared they must go.

Mr. Meredith regretted that they must leave, but begged, with his most captivating smile:

"May I have the pleasure, Miss Gladstone, of coming with my sister to call upon you?"

"Certainly," Star replied, graciously, for she was pleased with both brother and sister. "I shall be very happy to have you do so. We live——"

"Wait a minute, Star, and I will write our address down for them. It is so difficult to remember numbers, I am afraid they will forget;" and taking a leaf from a small notebook that was in his pocket, Mr. Rosevelt wrote both street and number and passed it to young Meredith.

Star thought he looked surprised as he read it. Was it because of the humble locality, she wondered.

Then they exchanged good nights and parted. When they reached the street, Mr. Rosevelt said:

"I am going to call a carriage, dear, for I know you are just ready to drop from weariness;" and Star did not object, for she was indeed exceedingly tired.

When they reached home she insisted upon making a cup of tea for Uncle Jacob; but the old gentleman was so absent-minded that she felt almost guilty for having kept him up so late, and feared he would be ill tomorrow.

She put away the tea things when they were through, and was about to light her lamp to retire, when he stopped her, saying:

"Star, my dear, come and sit down upon this ottoman by me; I have something I wish to say to you."

She obeyed, wondering what had happened to make him look and speak so gravely.

"Are you really happy tonight, my child?" he asked, tenderly.

A startled look came into the girl's eyes at this question, and her heart leaped with sudden pain as her thoughts went bounding over the sea to one to whom she had given the first grand passion of her soul.

"Uncle Jacob," she answered, gravely, though he could see the quiver about her lips, which she tried in vain to repress, "I am happier than I ever expected to be again. It is useless to regret or mourn over the past. I have tried to be sensible over it, but sometimes, I am afraid, I have not succeeded very well," she added, with a smile that was a trifle bitter. "If," she added, more brightly, a moment after, "that one episode could have been left out of my life, I believe there would be nothing to mar it now."

"I would that it could have been so," Mr. Rosevelt sighed. "But I want you to listen to me for a little while. I know it is late, and you ought to go to rest, but I particularly wish to tell you a short story of my life tonight. It is a page which has been turned from sight for many years, and no one has ever read it save myself. You are about entering upon a new era in your life. I have learned to love you very tenderly, my child, and I want to bind you yet closer to me."

"Why, Uncle Jacob, you do not think I have any idea of going away from you, I hope," Star said, in surprise.

"No, for I have grown to feel that you belong to me. Do you remember telling me, on board that ill-fated steamer, that your name was Star Rosevelt Gladstone, and how surprised you were when you learned that my last name was the same as your middle one?"

"Yes, sir; and I still think it a strange coincidence," Star answered.

"Perhaps you will be more surprised when I tell you that you were named for me."

Star looked up at him astonished

"How can that be possible?" she asked.

"In this way," Mr. Rosevelt returned, a shade of pain crossing his face. "When your grandmother, Stella Winthrop—that was her name before her marriage, was it not?"

"Yes; and that is all I know about her, Uncle Jacob," Star answered, with a troubled look.

"It seems strange that I should be the one to tell you about her," Mr. Rosevelt said, thoughtfully. "Did your father ever have any trouble with his family?"

"Not that I know of; and yet," Star said, flushing, "there was some trouble about his marriage with mamma, though that seems to have been on the part of her family rather than his. Mrs. Richards once twitted me about mamma—who was a sort of cousin to her—having married beneath her."

"I do not see how that could have been, for the Mr. Gladstone who married Stella Winthrop was a very wealthy and important man in the county of Devonshire—at least, I was told so—and if your father was his son, he might have married almost any one he chose, and have conferred an honor in so doing. But this is not telling you my story.

"When Stella Winthrop was of your age, and I three or four years older, we met at a large reception in London. That meeting was fatal to us both, for we loved from that hour as true lovers ever love. For six months the world was like Paradise to us, and then I was called away to the far East on business for the firm with which I was connected.

"If I was successful in my business undertaking, it was agreed that I might claim my bride when I returned at the end of two years. The vessel on which I sailed was wrecked, and it was reported that every passenger on board was lost, while only a very few of the crew lived to tell the story of the disaster. But I was fortunate enough to secure a large cask, and with this I managed to keep afloat for two days, when I was picked up by a sailing vessel bound for the Philippine Islands.

"My first work upon reaching land was to write to Stella and tell her of my safety; but my letter never reached her. I also notified the firm that I was all right, and should proceed directly about the business upon which I had been sent, but they knew nothing of my connection with Miss Winthrop, and accordingly did not communicate with her. I kept writing at intervals to my beloved, but never heard anything in return. At last, in despair, I wrote to the firm, telling them of my engagement, and asking them to notify her of my safety and give her my address in case she should have happened to lose the one I had given her. In reply, they said that the Winthrop family had gone abroad for an indefinite stay. Of course, this was a great trial to me, and I was exceedingly impatient; but my two years were over at last, and I turned my face toward England once more. I had succeeded in my business beyond my most sanguine expectations, and I looked forward to the immediate fulfillment of my hopes when I should return.

"My first duty on reaching London was to acquaint my employers with the result of my transactions, and my next thought was for Stella—my bright Star. Never for an instant had I doubted her fidelity; I believed she would be as true to me as I was to her, and my heart beat high with hope as I bounded up the familiar steps leading to her home and rang the bell. I asked for Miss Winthrop of the maid who answered my summons, and she stared at me as if she thought me demented.

"'Miss Winthrop?' she repeated. 'There is no Miss Winthrop, sir; she was married and went away nearly a year ago.'

"'Married!' The word was like a thunderbolt to me, and in an instant all the light went out of my life—my heart was paralyzed. I staggered from the place, and hid myself from every one for a week. Then I gained something of the calmness and courage to go out among my friends and try to learn how it happened that Stella Winthrop had married. As I told you before, it was reported that every passenger on the vessel in which I sailed was lost. Those of the crew who were saved affirmed that such was the case, and my betrothed had believed that I was dead.

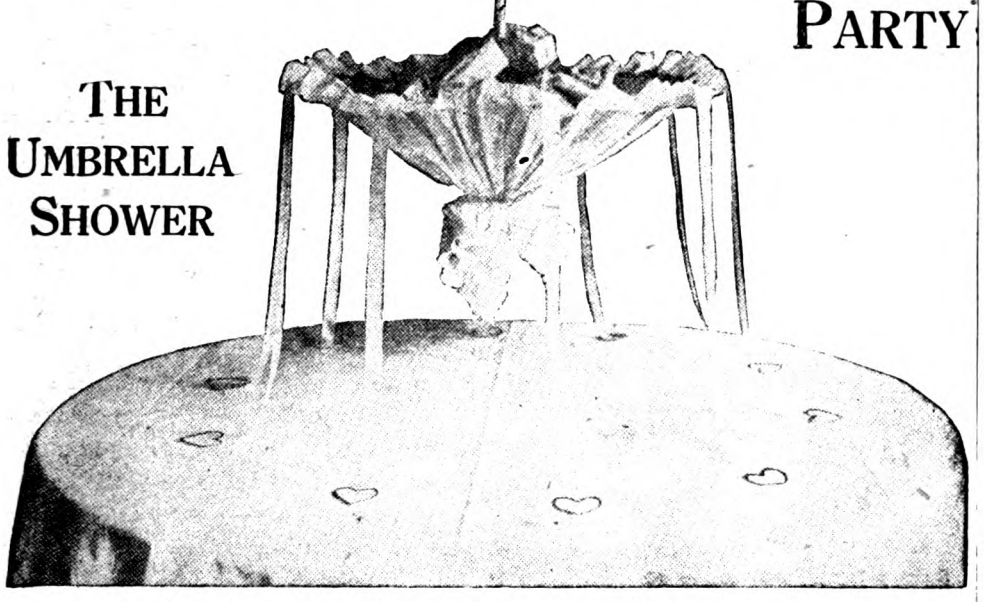
"She grieved herself almost to death over my loss, and her parents, fearing they would lose her also, took her abroad and traveled for many months. It was during this absence that the firm received my letter relating to her, but were unable to learn her address, as she was moving from point to point, and so could not communicate with her.

"Six months after learning my fate, she met Mr. Gladstone in Paris. He fell in love with her, and offered himself to her. He was a gentleman in every sense of the word, was kind and sympathetic, and she liked him as a friend. She told him the story of her grief, and that she could never marry. He was patient with her, and when at length a second time he asked her to marry him, she told him that she could never love him as she had loved me, but if he could be content to take her with what respect she could give him, and the duty she would strive to yield him, she would become his wife. He told her he would be content, and they were married—a year and three months after I sailed on the fatal voyage.

"They traveled several months longer, and when at length on their return to London, only three or four months before I arrived there, she learned that I had not perished, but was soon expected back, the shock nearly killed her a second time. Her husband was all kindness and attention, took her immediately away again, and showered everything that wealth could buy upon her; and after a time children were born to her, and those new ties aroused her to her sense of duty as a mother. I never saw her, for I had not courage to look upon her dear face, knowing that she had become the wife of another; for I never ceased to love her, and with an affection that amounted to idolatry. They told me that she had two children—two noble boys, one of them resembling her, the other his father—that she was a tender, faithful mother, and very much beloved by every one who knew her.

"That was forty years ago, Star, and for thirty I have not heard one word concerning either her or her family."

His voice broke, his lips quivered painfully, and it seemed for a moment as if he must break down utterly.



"When I first saw you," he continued, after a moment, "there was something in your face that touched me—a light in your eye, a sheen on your hair, that somehow smote a familiar chord in my heart. I watched you, although you were not aware of it, and felt sorry for you during that dreadful storm at sea; for your white face and great, startled eyes appealed to me as nothing had done for many a year. But I would not yield to it. I had shut my heart to every one; I vowed that I would never love any one again, and I mistrusted every one who sought to win me to a better mood. But when that lurch of the boat threw you directly into my arms, and you clung to me in such a helpless way, I could not resist you, and some good angel prompted me to gather you close to me and make you rest upon me. When you told me your name, the shock nearly unmanned me—'Star Rosevelt Gladstone,' you said—and I knew as well as if I had been told, that you were in some way connected with my lost Star, and I watched over you all the night through, feeling almost as if some sweet spirit had been sent from her to me, to give me a little ray of comfort at the end of my long, loveless life.

"When, the next morning, you told me that your grandmother had named you, and that her name was Stella Winthrop, I had not a doubt; I felt convinced that you must be the child of one of her sons. You thought it merely a strange coincidence, but I knew better, and all my boasted coldness and hardness melted away, and I began to love you then and there. When that dreadful explosion occurred, and you urged me to save myself, as 'doubtless I had dear friends' and 'you

AN ENGAGEMENT ANNOUNCEMENT PARTY

THE UMBRELLA SHOWER

By Violet Marsh

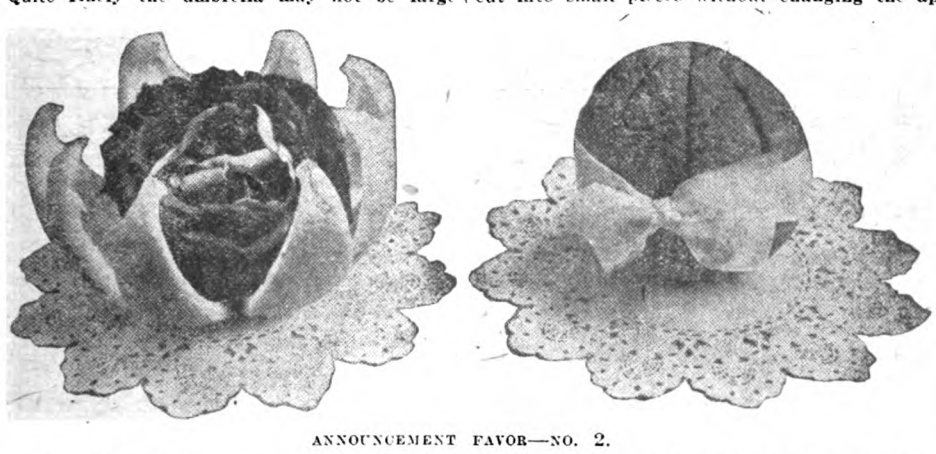
"ALL the world loves a bride," and so do all the girls I know anything about love an engagement shower. There are many forms of arrangement for presenting these tokens of love, but whichever one you choose, keep it simple and free from embarrassment to the recipient.

I would suggest that the decorations be gathered from the fields and woods which now abound in beauteous and wonderful growths just unfolding to meet the light and sunshine of a new world. Could anything be more appropriate?

One of the loveliest effects I know is a shallow glass dish filled with early spring mosses which in turn are filled with wild violets. If kept wet they will last for days.

For height there is nothing prettier than the spring "pussy-toes," and everyone knows the charm and fragrance of apple blossoms. If you push back the carpet of fallen leaves you will find graceful vines fit to garland any room. The wild lilies are as exquisite as any grown in hothouses, and in fragrance nothing surpasses the trailing arbutus, or Mayflower as it is sometimes called. The variety of wild flora changes in different localities, but nearly everywhere the woods and fields abound in nature's treasures.

The Umbrella Shower



At the head of this column is pictured an umbrella so arranged as to hold a linen shower. The umbrella has a curved handle which is suspended from a hook in the ceiling by means of white sash ribbon. The handle is well wrapped with white crepe tissue paper, while the same material is used to cover both inside and outside of the umbrella. Extend the edge of paper beyond the edge of umbrella and smooth into a ruffle effect. A few long stitches will be necessary to hold the paper in place. Tie the top of umbrella with a huge paper bow. To carry out the decorative effect, some of the packages have each a long ribbon the other end of which is brought down to the table where it is held by a paper heart. These hearts may be large enough to hold some written sentiment of the giver.

Quite likely the umbrella may not be large enough to hold all the packages, in which case those in excess are piled beneath it.

Where the event includes a standup luncheon, the umbrella is suspended higher, and the food attractively arranged on the table, together with dishes and silver ready for service.

ANNOUNCEMENT FAVOR—NO. 1.

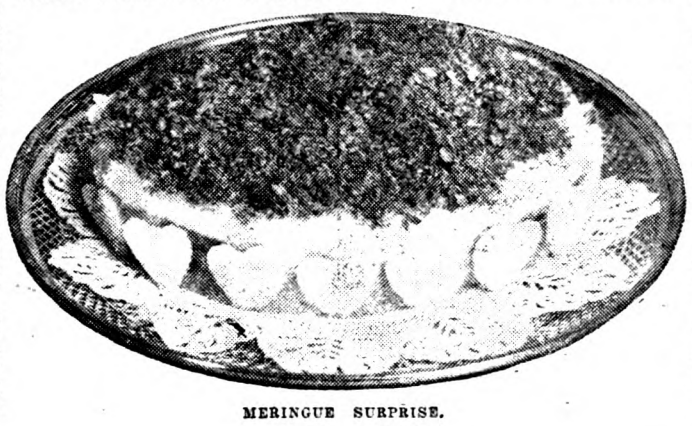
ANNOUNCEMENT FAVOR—NO. 2.

The Announcement Luncheon

The recipes given below will assist the one who wishes that which is simple, delicious and unusual. Whatever the drinks are, it will save confusion to have someone pass them on a tray, while a second tray follows close behind bearing sugar and cream for chocolate and coffee, and slices of lemon into which a clove has been stuck for tea. The small luncheon biscuit should be split and buttered before serving, and while hot. Strawberries at this season greatly assist in making a luncheon delicious and attractive.

ANNOUNCEMENT FAVORS, No. 1.—Select small celluloid dolls that will stand firmly when the feet are glued to the cardboard circle. The idea is particularly well carried out by dressing the doll to represent a page, who holds between his hands a paper tray which bears a card with an engagement ring painted in one corner, while in the opposite corner are outlined two hearts linked together. Across the card are painted the given names of the engaged couple, which in the picture are given as "Nan-Ned."

ANNOUNCEMENT FAVORS, No. 2.—The right-hand illustration pictures the favor as it will appear at the plate of each guest. These are made from carefully selected oranges and half-bloomed roses of uniform sizes. The orange rinds are cut from the stem end down the sides with a sharp-pointed knife into eighths, and just far enough to remove the entire orange. In place of the orange the rose is inserted as shown in the picture to the left, and in the heart of the rose is tucked a little paper scroll, tied with ribbon, which when opened announces the engagement. Use red roses if obtainable. The sections of the orange rind are now carefully brought together and held in place by carrying a white satin ribbon around the orange and holding it with a handome bow.



MOULDED CHICKEN SALAD.—Prepare a chicken the same as for roasting, stuff with one cup of moistened bread-crumbs highly seasoned with salt, pepper, one thin slice of onion, and one chopped sour pickle, or other pickle. Sew up the neck and crop opening, tie the legs to the body and steam until very tender, which will require several hours. When thoroughly cold, remove the skin, fat, bone and gristle, reserving them for a soup. The stuffing will be delicious served with cold meat of any kind. Cut up the meat but not too fine as it gives an unappetizing consistency. To three cups of cut-up meat, take three tablespoons of granulated gelatine, let it stand in three tablespoons of cold water about 15 minutes and then dissolve in one cup of boiling water. Add at once to the chicken, season with salt and one tablespoon of lemon juice, stir thoroughly and set over night where it is cold. About two hours before serving, whip one and one-third cup of very heavy cream, taking care it does not turn to butter. Fold this into the jellied chicken and pour into a dish that will give the desired shape of mould. Serve on a bed of crisp white lettuce leaves.

STRAWBERRY AND PINEAPPLE SALAD.—Fresh or canned pineapple can be used. The hard centers are removed from the slices of pineapple which are then placed on the serving dish and cut into small pieces without changing the appearance of a whole slice. Cover each slice with strawberries cut into quarters and garnish with small white lettuce leaves. Pour over the salad a sweet dressing made as follows: Use the pineapple juice as a foundation. To one-half cup add three tablespoons of salad oil, two tablespoons of sugar, one tablespoon of lemon juice, and a pinch of salt. The salad should be served as soon as put together.

NUT PATTIES.—Sift together three times, five even tablespoons of flour and one-half cup of powdered sugar. Beat one whole egg until very creamy, then gradually beat in with the egg-beater one-half cup of powdered sugar that has been sifted free from lumps. Now beat in the mixed flour and sugar, one-half cup of chopped pecan meats, and a few drops of almond extract. Stir well and drop in teaspoonfuls on an oiled biscuit tin. Place in a moderate oven and bake twenty minutes.

LUNCHEON BISCUITS.—Sift together two cups of flour, one-half teaspoon of salt, and four teaspoons of baking powder. Into this work two slightly rounded tablespoons of butter, and mix soft as can be handled with about three-fourths cup

MERINGUE SURPRISE.

FROM SOUP

When your pantry is supplied with National Biscuit Company products you are well prepared for all food occasions. Not only does it mean a great saving of your time, and freedom from embarrassment, it means also that those at your table—young and old—will derive added meal-time enjoyment and nourishment from these appetizing aids. There's something special for every course, every meal, as well as for those odd occasions when hunger calls.

TO DESSERT

At dinner, for instance, serve Oysterettes with the soup. With later courses, Uneeda Biscuit, N. B. C. Graham Crackers, Lorna Doone Shortbread, and flaky, slightly salt Premium Soda Crackers. Then for dessert, or as dessert, serve Ramona, Anola or Nabisco Sugar Wafers, or all three on the same dish. Not forgetting tempting Fig Newtons, those golden cake surprises with their inner layer of luscious fig jam. Mealtime never goes wrong with these tempting foods at your ready call.

Cubby Bear Seeks New Friends

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

CUBBY Bear brushed his hair and made himself tidy one summer morning, kissed Mamma Bruin and Grandma Bear good by, and started off happily for a day among new scenes and new faces.

"I am going toward the west, the way the bright sun travels," he said, "and try to find new friends."

As he approached the line where his own Pleasant Forest merged into the West Forest, he came upon little Chickadee Chirrupee.

"Chickadee dee-dee-dee-dee-dee-dee!" the little bird chirped blithely.

"Good morning," called Cubby Bear. "How happy you seem!"

"Aren't you happy, too?" asked Chickadee.

"Yes," answered Cubby, "so happy that I want to make others so! This day I have started out to be kind to all I meet, and to help them, for I want to make new friends."

Chickadee's little black eyes shone.

"Oh, if you really mean that," he cried, "I shall fly around and tell the good news to everybody I see!"

When Chickadee had gone, Cubby said to himself, "I already have friends in this West Forest—I will look up the Badger family."

He had been to Betty Badger's house before, so knew the way.

"What fun!" said Betty, when Cubby had told her how he meant to spend the day. "We will go with you."

So after Betty had hastily washed the five Little Badgers' faces, they trailed along after Cubby Bear.

"I can show you where little Ruby Hummingbird lives," said one Little Badger.

"But she will not let you come near," added his brother.

"She likes the honey from flowers," Cubby remembered, "so I will pick an armful, and carry them to her."

The Badgers helped, and Cubby carried a huge bouquet of sweet wild flowers and laid them on the ground underneath the humming-bird's tiny nest. There was a whirring of little gauzy wings, and Cubby hastily withdrew.

"The flowers are to give you honey, little bird," called Cubby. "Do not be afraid."

A brown-furred animal sprang up from a bed of moss at their approach, and was starting off when Cubby said, "Oh, wait, Mr. Marten! You were in the Pleasant Forest that night of the moon's eclipse! Please do not go yet. I want to talk to you!"

"I am in a hurry," was all the Marten would stop to say.

"Chipper, chapper! chipper, chapper!" cried a voice above them, and a shower of leaves fell on Cubby's head. A sleek gray squirrel with plumy tail followed the leaves, coming to the ground in a long, graceful leap.

"How pretty you are!" exclaimed Cubby admiringly. "What is your name?"

"I am Griffie Gray. I don't need to ask who you are—Chickadee told me about you. You haven't a nut in your pocket, have you?"

"No," answered Cubby. "I am sorry. But go home with me, to Mamma Bruin's house, and you shall have as many nuts as you can eat."

"I will go," promised Griffie Gray, "and I will be your friend."

So Griffie went along with Cubby and the others.

"I can tell you of an animal who does not live here, but who is passing through the forest. I saw him fixing a bed in a thicket a little while ago." This from Griffie.

"Oh, let us go and see him!" said Cubby.

"He might not be pleasant if you woke him," objected Griffie. "He is the Fisher, and is not often seen around here."

Cubby, unafraid, went to see the Fisher. He was sleeping lightly, seeming to have an eye out for danger.

"Go away!" he called ungraciously.

"Oh, but I would like to be friends with you," said Cubby Bear.

"I am only passing through here, bound for the Green Mountains of Vermont. Will you leave me in peace?" growled the Fisher.

"I would like to hear the story of your travels," said Cubby wistfully.

"I have traveled far, and am tired, but if you come too near, I shall forget that I am tired, and then you will be sorry!" The Fisher glared at them angrily.

Cubby turned sadly away.

"I am glad he did not come with us," said Betty Badger. "We want only those who will be pleasant and polite.

"Oh, look! look there!" cried the oldest Little Badger. "I can see Brown Bat, asleep, clinging to that branch. If I could reach him, we would take him along."

Griffie Gray climbed to the branch in a twinkling, and gently loosing the little creature's hold, tossed him lightly down to the Little Badger.

"Here, Cubby Bear," said the Little Badger, "is another friend for you. Brown Bat will sleep all day, but when night comes he will be lively enough, and then you can make friends with him."

"OH, IT MUST BE ZAPUS JUMPING-MOUSE AND HIS BROTHERS!" CRIED BETTY.

"I see an Oven-bird's nest!" said Griffie Gray, and carefully pulled away some dried leaves from a little pile on the ground. A curious nest it was, shaped like a Dutch oven, with an opening in one side.

"I can see eggs inside," Griffie told them. "Pretty, spotted eggs."

A sharp "Chip, chip, chip!" was heard close by.

"We shall not harm your nest, Mrs. Oven-bird," promised Cubby. "Please, will you be my friend?"

"I bear you no ill-will," answered the bird, "but I will not come near you. I never care to be with others."

They had not gone far after this when they saw seven tiny animals hurrying toward them, making most surprising leaps and bounds.

"Oh, it must be Zapus Jumping-mouse and his brothers!" cried Betty.

Now jumping-mice are quite different from the mice that live in houses and barns. They are of a rusty-yellowish color, with long, strong hind-legs and feet, and slender tails much longer than their little bodies.

"We have come to see you, Cubby Bear," spoke up little Zapus, all seven of them sitting up and holding out their little fore-paws pleadingly. "Chickadee Chirrupee said you would help us. We had a beautiful, smooth playground for our jumping games, and now droves of big ants have stolen it and are building their great community nests there! Can you drive them away?"

"It would be easier to build another playground, I think," Cubby told them. "Their bite is not pleasant, and there are so many of them in a colony——"

"But we are so small," said poor little Zapus, almost in tears, "it would take us all summer to clear such another playground!"

"Come with me on my travels today," said Cubby, "and then go home with me to Mamma Bruin's house tonight. Tomorrow Mamma Bruin and I will make you a beautiful, smooth, playground, and we would love to watch your games. We are so large and strong we could easily do it in a day."

Zapus and his six brothers were happy once more, and hopped and bounded along with Cubby Bear.

They saw the gleam of water through the trees, and came to a small pond.

Chickadee Chirrupee was there, talking with Froggie Freckles.

Froggie splashed into the water and swam to the middle of the pond. Then, throwing up his fore-paws, he shouted:

"Come and save me, Cubby Bear! Do not let me drown!" Then he sank in the muddy water.

"No, no; don't go!" cried Betty Badger. "Wait—let me tell you——"

But Cubby had already started bravely to the rescue.

The bottom of the pond was soft, and after taking a few quick steps Cubby Bear found he could no longer move his feet. They were stuck fast in the mud. Worse than this, he felt himself sinking slowly.

"It is a quagmire!" cried Betty in distress. "I know this pond—I was trying to tell you about it. Stand still! do not struggle, or you will sink faster!"

The voice of the oldest Little Badger broke forth in a wild cry.

"Cubby Bear will drown!" he shrieked. "Why don't somebody save him? I will pull him out, myself!" And he plunged into the water.

His mother promptly seized him and drew him out.

"It will do Cubby Bear no good for you to drown, too," she told him.

Froggie Freckles was swimming around Cubby Bear distractedly.

"Oh, I am sorry!" he croaked. "I only meant to play a joke on you! You couldn't drown a frog—didn't you know that? I was going to tell you this was a dangerous place for you, but I didn't think you would get stuck so soon. It must be dangerous because you are so heavy. Can't you pull yourself out? Oh, try hard!"

Betty Badger and her children dragged a stick to the edge of the pond, and pushed it out where Cubby could reach it, but were not strong enough to pull him ashore.

Little Chickadee called, "See this yellow birch tree close to the water's edge? If we could only bend this long branch down where Cubby could reach it, he could pull himself out!"

"We need more weight to bend it down," said Griffie.

"I will fly for help," offered Chickadee.

He soon came back, with Policeman Bob Catt, Mr. Marten and the Fisher.

They all rushed to the branch of the tree, even little Chickadee adding his tiny weight to help bring it within Cubby's reach.

Joyfully Cubby seized the branch, and after a long, hard struggle, he managed to pull himself up to safety. Paw over paw he carefully worked his way along.

When he was safe on solid ground once more, dripping black mud, they gathered about him joyously.

"Now all come home with me, to Mamma Bruin's house," said Cubby Bear.

"No, no," refused the Fisher. "I must be on my way."

"No, no," echoed Mr. Marten.

"Oh, but Mamma Bruin will want to thank every one who helped to rescue me! Please come!" coaxed Cubby.

So Marten and Fisher, Bob Catt, Betty Badger and her children (the oldest one dragging little Brown Bat by one wing), Zapus Jumping-mouse and his brothers, Griffie Gray, Chickadee Chirrupee, and Froggie Freckles, all started for the Pleasant Forest with Cubby Bear.

The shy Oven-bird came out when they passed her home, and offered to let Cubby dry himself by her oven, and little Ruby Hummingbird hovered in the air near Cubby's ear long enough to tell him how glad she was he had not been drowned.

As the bright sun was sinking in the west, Cubby Bear and his friends, their journey ended, found Mamma Bruin standing in her doorway.

"What has happened to you, Cubby Bear?" she asked. "You are covered with black mud!"

"Oh, I do not mind the mud, Mamma Bruin," Cubby told her joyously, "for, see, all the good friends I have brought home with me! And only think, they saved me from drowning!"

"Come in, come in, all of you," invited Mamma Bruin opening wide the door. "I have supper enough for everyone, and after you have eaten, you shall help Cubby tell me the story of the day's adventures!"

COMFORT for one year and admittance to the League of Cousins for only 55 cents. Join at once. Everybody welcome. ADDRESS all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. See Instructions at the close of this Department.

IT is an old and true instinct that turns us toward the earth these days—to garden and ploughlands, to the gathering of the first Spring flowers and of those new little sticky leaves as wonderful and beautiful themselves as any blossoms. Billy I see only about twice a day—for breakfast and supper. Between these important hours of bran muffins and cocoa he is spending long out-of-doors days after his months of attachment to radiators and the liniment bottle. The mound of letters which mounts higher than my desk tells of Bill's neglect of his accustomed duties and diet. But I am patient and weight the scattering overflowing mass down with a pile of paving brick. For I doubt not that even dandelions will satiate in time, and that Bill will return dragging his pivot teeth behind him, so to speak, ready to add a little assorted wood pulp to his interior botanical gardens.

As I love the deeper warmer sun of these days, and rejoice in getting my feet away from icy pavements and on to springy sod, I have taken some short walking trips. In these expeditions afield I have often paused to think a bit sadly to myself of how man's life today must so often be inevitably cut off from the satisfaction of that natural turning toward the soil which should be normally his in the months of the world's rebirth. I like to think that perhaps the happiest races are those who have lived in the simplest manner and clung the more closely to Mother Earth. The Chinese, for instance, have been farmers for four thousand years, and the course of the seasons, seedtime and harvest, sun and rain, have become almost a religion with them. It is an achievement in agriculture that after these thousands of years of tillage the soil of China is yet as productive as in the first ploughings. While we have wasted what nature has given us, the Chinese have nursed and guarded their heritage. Before all else, they are an agrarian race, and one can read this in their history, their literature and their religious forms. Much of the conservatism of China, I believe, can be traced to their existence upon the soil and their blending of their lives with the slow but sure processes of nature.

In thinking of the Chinese, we need not turn up our Western noses haughtily—as I am sure that Billy would do, for one. We can learn much from the Chinese, from their attitude toward nature and life, and from a sympathetic study of their instinctive holding at bay of the world-spreading—I almost wrote world-wrecking—tendencies of industrial nationalism. For we need badly today a respect for and an appreciation of what the true fundamentals of natural happy living are. For instance, we live in a time when a false and dangerous value is being set on all things of the intellect. Man is building his brain into a Tower of Babel that can never reach the heaven toward which he aims—low though that heaven be. In this period of the growth of cities, in this stressing by education of those things only that will aid us to hold a niche in the complex struggle of our material civilization, we are arriving at an age of fatal unfaith in all simple human things—or perhaps I should say a neglect of the power and primary importance of the place the old natural human instincts must form in man's happiness. We erect barriers and allow them to be erected for us between ourselves and our fellows. We do not leave ourselves time to push aside the screen that a false sense of the values of life has placed between us and the God in whom we live and have our being. We foolishly let ourselves be cut off from a natural life close to that earth upon which we were meant to dwell as happy children—and not as quarreling, over-intellectualized, sickly creatures of unnatural growth. We have cast aside our birthright in too many instances. We can only faint with hunger upon dry husks of the intellect until we remember our Father's house and our proper place in it.

Kipling writes of the importance of being able to "walk with kings" without losing "the common touch." We need a cultivation of the common touch today, I think. Those who attempt to set our customs and dictate the standards of our life and education have failed of the ideal given in Kipling's striking line. If crowned two-legged kings have been scarce to companion them, they have walked with the kings of their own and other intellectual domains. And their common touch, their grasp upon the simple human truths of life and God have failed them. They have come to believe and would command us to believe that life can answer best to the scepter of the brain and that there the seat of power rests. But there can come no responding court bows—at least no happy ones—from the children of men who are in truth subjects of a very different Ruler from that set up by the uncommon brains of our "leaders" of modern thought and philosophy. How bad the mistake is that has been made in this demand for false allegiance Nature will finally tell us—and in the telling will take her own sweet and slow way to repair the damage done and the wounds given.

And as for leaders, I like to imagine the possibility of our some day having a Farmer President. A man who, like Lincoln, would have "the common touch" joined to companionship with the only King. A man who could have his roots firmly in the soil of his country, and a brain, deepened by true human living and bearing no influences of those ephemeral teachings of our day and education which really are less than scratches upon the permanent things of the life of man upon the earth. Such a ruler would touch the chords of our national life with a strong, sure and tender hand. Democracy with him would be instinct, not phrase. A very part of him would be the knowledge of how inevitably bound up with the life of the earth is the natural life of man. And he would know where to look for the true bases of happiness, and how to raise a standard of those values which exist ever, because they are eternal, under all our false accretions of modern living.

In our civilization, as we call it, man today makes huge circles and goes devious ways for the primary purposes of gaining food, lodging and clothes to cover him. What he often wins of these simple things, let anyone look into our cities or industrial centers and answer. The wheel, which is our world, grows larger and wider-rimmed to make places for all who would hang to hub and felloes, and there are constantly heavier tires to crush those who are knocked off in the scramble or who have been unable to get secure foothold as the speed increases. Yet the simple living upon the earth, which is all that is needed for man's happiness, and without which, in fact, his happiness cannot exist, is always ready to be given from Nature's hands. She stands unchangeable in the rewards she offers, while in our cities today thousands fight, literally to the death, for the necessaries our complex and unnatural living makes so hard to win.

I was going to write more upon this subject which means much to me, when Billy came marching importantly in, bringing with him a breath of moist fresh air and a scent of mud and green things.

"Whatever are you doing? Uncle Lisha," he exclaimed; "staying inside a day like this! Are you bothering with these old letters?"—and Bill laid an inquiring nose upon the big pile about my desk. "For if you are, take your hat and get out in the sun. I'll attend to them!"

And so I took Bill's kindly meant advice and went into the spring sunshine. As I closed the door, I heard a steady sound of munching and crunching. I think that Billy's walk gave him an appetite.

And now for the letters:

ETHER, NORTH CAROLINA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

It is imperative this letter be published. You will learn why when you proceed to read. This is the "Hermit of the Hills" writing again. Since my letter appeared in the December COMFORT I have been compelled to vacate my cave to make room for letters. It is already filled to overflowing, with not even standing room left for yours truly any more. There are letters to stir all the emotions of man. Some would make you laugh, others would make you cry, a few would make you feel like swearing, and great numbers are friendly, sensible letters that vividly express the beautiful character of the writers and make you feel that life is worth living after all.

I have received no less than twelve or fifteen direct proposals. I am too tender-hearted to reject any of them, yet I am afraid if I accept them all there will be war in the camp right away. So you must tell me what to do, Uncle Lisha.

So many requests came for samples of those "lovely curls" I told you about, that my head is now as devoid of hair as a toad's back—and still I am about a thousand orders behind. You must tell me what to do about this, also, because you were partly the cause of it all, for I didn't want the girls to know my real name and wished to be known only as the "Hermit of the Hills." Could you recommend a tonic, Uncle Lisha, that would produce a new set of curls on my head right away?

Let me say to all the cousins and readers who have written me, that I could answer only a few (I am sure I have received over fifteen hundred letters in the past month and they are still coming), but every single one was highly appreciated and I am keeping them all as extremely interesting souvenirs.

I will now use a few words to describe the paramount desirableness of the Tarheel State. The climate is very healthful and people never die here except of disease, accident and old age. That is one salient point, isn't it? The soil is very productive, hence we can raise everything we need to eat and are not dependent upon any other state for existence. Winston-Salem is the largest city. This city is a great tobacco market and millions of cigars and cigarettes are manufactured there every week. High Point is one of the greatest furniture manufacturing cities in the South. The White Oak Cotton Mill at Greensboro ranks among the largest in the world; and, of course, Ether, my home town, is so world-famous it would be superfluous to tell about it here. Thousands of crates of delicious peaches are shipped from the orchards in the "Sand Hill" section of southern North Carolina every year, and the apples produced in the mountain regions of western Carolina are among the finest in the world. All things considered, North Carolina is just about the creme de la creme of the Union.

Uncle Lisha, when you see this letter published, please hustle Billy the Goat off for a long vacation.

Again thanking all of you who have written to me, I remain,

The same
CARL A. MANESS,
alias Hermit of the Hills.

You don't express much sorrow, Carl, about having been driven out of your mountain cave and away from the wildcats and other charming pets of your lonely hermitage about which you last wrote to us. I think the truth is all hermits like to get out in the world once in a while—particularly when they can emerge and breathe the life-giving Ether of such a state as you describe yours to be.

About your more than a dozen proposals from would-be hermitesses, Carl; I don't think you will have any further matrimonial entanglements now that you have revealed your curlless, bald-headed condition. The charm will be gone, for curls are a great attraction, it seems, for the feminine heart about which they must have a way of twining. Ask Cousin Ted Carmichael, down in Carrizozo, New Mexico, about this. The only reason Ted is not as bald as you, Carl, is that he had an old buffalo robe from which he cut a tiny dark curl for each letter that demanded a hirsute sample with the Carmichael brand. It was a big hide, but it did not quite go 'round and Teddy had to start a vacant place over one of his ears. But it saved almost all the curls he had planted on his cowboy dome and you ought to have looked up some such substitute, Carl—a curly wildcat, or some lady coon that had taken to wearing marcel waves. But it's too late now. I feel sad to think of your high and intellectual hermit brow shining brightly in the spring sunlight. Of course, you must try some sort of a tonic. The best one I know about is to find some old haircloth sofa not too much worn. Take about six square feet of the thickest covering of this sofa, cut in small pieces, and boil in two gallons of best cider vinegar for four hours. Strain and cool, and apply to the head by rubbing in well with a circular motion, following grain. The hair produced by this treatment is apt to be stiff and shiny. Not a curl can be expected; but bald-headed men cannot be choosers—and hair is hair. I knew one man who grew a head of haircloth covering in this way, and it proved to be so slippery that the only way he could hold his hat on was to keep a lump of tar in the crown. But then you have plenty of tar down in North Carolina, Carl.

Since you were driven from your hermitage I think you must have joined the Ether Chamber of Commerce, Carl,—from the way you now write. In your first letter you spoke quite discouragingly about your state and seemed to think that it could produce nothing profitably but moonshine. There wasn't a bit of creme de la creme in your first hermit message, Carl. It was all skim-milk or mountain dew. But then this may have only been the gloomy effect of living in a damp cave without any proposals except those of the wildcats who proposed to dine off your handsome carcass. A bald-headed young Chamber of Commerce booster is very different from a long-curled, cave-dwelling hermit. Carl, you may have improved from the standpoint of a world of conformity, but you are not nearly as interesting as in your cave-man stage of development. I cannot ask you to turn back to your proposal-crowded cave—probably the only course left open for you now is to use your head and grow a few acres of haircloth for the High Point furniture factory.

CHARLOTTE, 617 West Lawrence Ave., MICH.

DEAREST UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS (ALSO BILLY):

I have just finished reading your department and have decided to write to you for the first time. But now that I have started, I don't suppose it will be the last. Uncle, I most surely wish you would put Billy's picture in the paper. Now that I have seen yours, I am anxious to see Billy's. I am sure that I would like him; I haven't the slightest doubt that I wouldn't. And I think that Billy would like me, for I am just a kid—and kids and goats are some relation!

I am eating some fudge that I made about a half hour ago, and it sure is good. Now don't think I am selfish, for I most heartily wish you and Billy were here so you could have some. Uncle, I am going to tell you something—but don't tell Billy. It is this: if Billy likes good homemade candy, and is real good, I will send him a box of it sometime. But you must remember that this will also be for you—and I will guarantee it not to give you the toothache. But it is awful rich, so you had better not eat too much of it at once. Of course, if you don't like good homemade fudge and divinity and other kinds of candy I will not send it to you.

If you want to know what I look like, I am five feet, three inches tall, have a brunette complexion, dark brown hair, and black eyes with long eyelashes. I am only thirteen years old, but everybody says I act and look as if I were sixteen. Isn't that ridiculous?—for I am always getting into mischief of some sort.

Tell Billy not to look at the misspelt words, for my dictionary is at school. I am a Freshie, but can't write good—as you can see.

Oh, dear! I just had to get up and get a drink, this candy is so sweet.

I am going downtown this afternoon, but I can't go for a while yet, as the gas men are here putting in a new meter and the gas is shut off—so I can't get any hot water to finish my work. I have had quite a few accidents today: When I was ironing with the electric iron this morning I burnt my hand, and gee! but it is sore. And when I was running the electric Hoover something must have got caught in it, for it would not run right and took me about half an hour to fix it.

It is 2.35 now and I have got an appointment downtown for 3 o'clock. I don't see how I will ever make it!

Uncle and cousins, do you think it is any worse for a girl to powder and paint than for a boy to smoke and chew tobacco?

I wish Billy would come and see me sometime—and you also. Tell Billy I will show him a dandy time if he will come. I will send you my picture sometime, if you want it, so Billy can see I am not so beautiful that I would be ashamed of him even if he has got gray whiskers. I bet he is full of fun anyway. And Uncle, I think you are just as grand as your picture. Well, I must close. So long, everybody!

Your niece and cousin and Billy's pal,
ISABEL CARDWELL.

There must have been something about your letter that Billy liked, Isabel, for he brought it to me, saying: "This is a sweet and breezy message from a Michigan cousin, Uncle. I thought you might like to print it. I see she claims to be some sort of a relative of mine—which is interesting." Of course, when Billy said "sweet," Isabel, he may have only meant that he had found a drop of your homemade fudge on one corner of the paper, for I must say that Bill has a very sweet pivot tooth and is much of a candy-hound. But I'm not sure if it would be entirely safe for Bill to eat any of your "awful rich" fudge. His constantly over-strained digestion is rather delicate. Anyhow, the best way would be to start him off on an ounce of "divinity" a day, administered with a medicine dropper and watch effects. Certainly divinity fudge should be divinely digestible, but you never can tell with Bill. He has a way of going by contraries.

But I think the real secret of Bill having favored your letter is that he liked what you wrote about having his picture in COMFORT. Isabel, if you knew how simply wild Billy is to have his photograph appear, you would laugh

Shall They Suffer
as you did from film on teeth

Pepsodent is largely for the coming generation. It brings to adults whiter teeth, new protection. But to children it means a new dental era.

Your teeth, perhaps, have always been film-coated, save right after dental cleaning. The luster has been dimmed by film. Film has caused decay, no doubt, despite your daily brushing.

Now dental authorities urge you to fight film. Above all, have your children fight it daily in this scientific way.

Makes teeth dingy

Modern science traces most tooth troubles to a film—to that viscous film you feel. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays.

It absorbs stains, making the teeth look dingy. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Germs breed by millions in it. Pyorrhea, and many other serious troubles, are chiefly caused by those germs and by tartar.

Dental science has for years been seeking a way to daily combat that film. It is the teeth's great enemy.

Two ways now found

Two effective film combatants have been found. Able authorities have subjected them to many careful tests. Dental science now approves them, and leading dentists, here and abroad, urge their daily use.

A new-day tooth paste has been perfected, complying with modern requirements. It is called Pepsodent. And these two film-combating methods are embodied in it.

Also starch deposits

Starch deposits also attack teeth. In fermenting they form acids.

Nature puts a starch digestant in the saliva. It puts alkalis there to neutralize the acids.

Pepsodent multiplies that starch digestant, also the alkalinity. Thus Nature's teeth-protecting forces are multiplied.

Thus twice a day, in all these ways, Pepsodent combats the enemies of teeth.

Watch the added beauty

Send the coupon for a ten-day test. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

The lasting benefits appear more slowly. But all who love clean, glistening teeth will see effects at once. And the book we send explains the reasons for them. Cut out the coupon now.

Round Prairie Observes Mothers' Monday

By Margaret A. Bartlett

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"ASK Betty, The Buyer—she'll help you!"

The words danced fastastically over the page of the newspaper Maria Josephs was trying to read. It was Monday evening—wash-day evening—and Maria knew why black dots floated before her eyes, and only certain words on the page before her were visible, and those appeared and disappeared, only to show up again in some unexpected spot. It was always like that Monday evening—unless a bad storm made it necessary to postpone the weekly washing.

Wearily, she kicked off first one worn shoe, and then the other. Drawing a chair nearer, she put her aching feet on its seat and leaned back in her hollow-backed rocker. Usually she felt quite rested when her stockinged feet were high off the floor, but tonight, as on all Monday nights, there seemed no way to ease the aching nerves and muscles.

On the opposite side of the drop-leaf table with its turkey-red checker-board patterned cloth, Andrew Josephs sat, enjoying his Monday evening perusal of the Sunday paper which the inhabitants of Round Prairie received by rural carrier Monday afternoon. Suddenly he threw aside the paper, pulled out his big silver turnip-watch and began winding it, preparatory to going to bed.

"What's the matter, Maria? Tired? No use sleeping down here. Better go to bed!" he advised.

"But, Andrew,"—Maria opened her eyes and straightened in her uneasy chair—"I haven't half looked through the paper. I did want to read a little while tonight, but that washing today has left me feeling as flat as a sponge cake a draught has struck. If only, Andrew——"

"Better stop right where you be, Maria," cut in her husband. "I don't want to hear any more of this electric washer nonsense. Women for a good many years have washed their clothes by scrubbing them on a wash-board, and I guess you ain't any better n they were."

"But, Andrew," pleaded his wife, "if only you knew how the weekly washing tuckers me out. I'm afraid I won't be able to do it at all much longer."

"Oh, you're kinda run down, Maria. I'll send tomorrow for a box of those Dr. Pearson's Pleasant Pellets. They'll fix you all right. Now, come on to bed. You won't get your bones rested any sitting there all night."

Maria heard him shuffle in his carpet-slippers to the table in the kitchen where the water-pail stood. She heard him drain the dipper with big, horse-like gulps, and then she watched the wavering light of the lamp as it rose higher and higher over the stairs. With senses suddenly awakened she listened breathlessly till the creaking of the heavy wooden bed told her that her husband was settled for the night.

Though her heart thumped at her temerity, she stole to the soap-order writing-desk she had earned twenty years or more ago, hunted up pen and ink and a sheet of writing paper, and sat down to it, spreading out before her the paper she had last been looking at. It contained the advertisement of Louden's Bigger and Better Department Store. In one corner was Betty, the Buyer's message to out-of-town women, urging them to find out how easy and satisfactory mail-order shopping could be, if goods were purchased from the Louden's store, and concluding with the request: If there is anything you wish to know, if you have any problem you can't solve, don't hesitate to write us. Just ask Betty, the Buyer—she'll help you!"

It was that final sentence that had flitted over the face of the newspaper a while before when Maria Josephs had tried to read it. It was those words, that invitation, which had been running through Maria's mind ever since. "Ask Betty, the Buyer!" Well—Maria bit the end of her pen viciously—well, since this Betty person asked her to do it, she'd tell her all her troubles!

Thus it was that the Louden Department Store received a few days later the following pathetic letter:

My Dear Betty, the Buyer:

You ask us to write you if we have any problems we cannot solve. I have one which is too big for me. I want to know what you would do if you were in my place. I am a woman fifty years old and not very strong. We live way back from everywhere and I have to do my work under about the same conditions my grandmother did hers. But I am not strong and the heavy work, such as washing dirty farm clothes, is too hard for me. My husband can afford an electric washing machine, for he can afford all the nice things he wants for his cows and barn, but he doesn't believe in women having things to make their work easier—he's afraid it will make us lazy. Now, I want a washing machine and believe I ought to have one, but how am I to get my husband to buy me one? There are ten or a dozen other women here in Round Prairie that need one like I do, but their husbands won't listen to them when they try to get them to buy one for them. You say you can help us. I hope you can, for I think we need help.

Very truly yours,

MRS. ANDREW (MARIA) JOSEPHS,

(Address) R. R. No. 4, Round Prairie, Colo.

Betty the Buyer smiled as she read the letter. She was used to all sorts of letters from all sorts and classes of women, but each was only a part of her work. She was paid to be tactful, pleasant, helpful, to all inquirers, to think always of how the store might benefit.

Now, she slipped a fresh piece of paper into her typewriter, and began her oft-repeated instructions to one of the mail-order department clerks. "Say," she wrote; then she hesitated. It would never do to let this woman's husband know she had written her troubles to a stranger. That would be the surest way of killing a possible sale. Any literature concerning washing-machines sent to the wife would receive only condemnation from the husband. Obviously no ordinary letter would do this time. She must be tactful, she must be pleasant and helpful, and above all, she must help the company increase its sales! An electric washer was a big item, something over a hundred dollars. And there were in Round Prairie, according to this Mrs. Josephs' letter, at least ten other women in need of the modern improvement over the tub and washboard of the age when women scrubbed their lives away because there was no help for it! If only she could corner the whole eleven of them!

"Miss Mason!"

Betty, the Buyer, held the Round Prairie letter out to the head of the mail-order department.

"I wish you would read this letter, and then tell me if you think I would be breaking the adamantine rules of this store if I neglected to answer Mrs. Josephs but instead wrote to her husband.

Miss Mason glanced quickly through the letter.

"Your judgment is always good, Betty. A pound of chocolates that you'll land them all." Thus did she acquiesce to Betty's implication that for once she was going to let a woman look in vain for a reply to her letter to Betty the Buyer.

Two days later when Andrew Josephs took his mail from the hands of the rural carrier as he passed the gate, his attention was caught by a flashing orange envelope addressed to him. In the upper left-hand corner smiled the pleasant face of a young woman, to the right of which was the inscription: "From Betty the Buyer, care of Louden's Bigger and Better Department Store, Denver, Colo." Maria, watching from the sitting-room window, saw him shove the letter into his pocket. Of course, she didn't know what letter it was, but she had been expecting her reply from "that Betty person," and now—— A panic seized her. Somehow her husband had found out about the letter she wrote. Just how she didn't see, for she had walked three miles to their nearest neighbor's in order to slip the letter into their mail-box just before the carrier arrived. Still, she knew he must have known about it, and so had taken her answer when it arrived. What would that Betty person say? What would Andrew think of her? "Oh——oh," she hid her head in her apron. He'd never forgive her, and, what seemed of even greater importance at the time, he would never, never get her a modern washing-machine now!

Out in the barn a half hour later, Andrew climbed up into the haymow, where he was confident no one coming suddenly into the barn would see him, sank into the fragrant dried grass and drew out the flaming envelope. He had a premonition that that letter was one for himself alone—not for Maria. He felt it all over, held it to the light, shook it, as if trying to guess its contents: then finally gathered courage to slip his knife between the flap and slit the top.

A sheet of paper of the same vivid color was folded within. In his excitement his hands shook as he unfolded the typewritten letter. It read:

DEAR MR. JOSEPHS:

By good authority I have been informed that you own one of the finest equipped dairy farms in your county. I understand that you have spared neither time nor money in installing every convenience known to dairymen in your barn—from a perfect ventilating system to individual drinking-cups for each bossy.

Naturally, I suppose you have provided for your wife's health and comfort in the same careful manner; but in case she is still laboring under old-fashioned conveniences, I am sure you will be interested in Louden's line of labor lighteners for women, especially in our electric washing machines.

I am enclosing a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Won't you please be so kind as to write to me personally, letting me know whether your wife has now an electric washer or not? I will return the favor in any way possible.

Wishing your wife a good long life, I am,

Most cordially yours,

BETTY THE BUYER.

"Well I'll be jiggered!" he exclaimed to the barn swallows and the mice and whatever other inhabitants of the barn were within hearing distance. "I swan if I can understand how those folks down there got all that information about me. But they want to sell me a washing-machine, do they? Good thing Maria didn't get hold of this letter. And they want me to write and let them know if my wife owns one or not? H-m-m! I wouldn't waste a good two-cent stamp on such a letter, but since they've enclosed an envelope ready-stamped—a government envelope, gosh blink 'em! the stamp can't be soaked off from!—I don't know as it will do any harm to answer them."

Accordingly, Andrew Josephs did just what Betty the Buyer had hoped he would do: he reversed the sheet of paper and, after a deal of fumbling deep down in the pencil-pocket of his overalls for a stub which persisted in keeping just out of reach, wrote the following:

"DEAR BETTY THE BUYER:

"Yours of the 18th instant received and contents noted. Much obliged for your words of praise of my barn. I don't know where you heard about it, but your news is o. k. As regards a washing machine for my wife, I wish to state emphatically that she does not own one and never will own one so long as I have any say about it. What does a woman want of a machine-run contraption? Women don't know anything about machinery. They'd be calling on us men all the time to help them run the thing. Washing may be hard work, but I believe women have washed the family linen since the time of Eve and I somehow think there are enough women living to dispute the claim that scrubbing clothes makes for early deaths. Of course I appreciate your interest in writing to me, but I'm afraid you will have to offer something better than a washing-machine to get my order.

"Yours respectively,

"ANDREW JOSEPHS."

The letter was surreptitiously mailed—and its orange-enveloped reply as surreptitiously received, so far, at least, as Maria was concerned. Andrew Josephs hated to admit it but he looked forward rather eagerly to that reply. He wondered with a grin what that Betty person would have to say to his denouncement of the electric washing-machine!

When the reply came he went directly to the barn with it, albeit Maria was watching from the window, anxious to learn if there was anything in the mail for her. (He explained later that he had heard the colt kicking and was afraid she might kick through the stall.) With no preliminaries this time he tore open the gaily-colored envelope and drew out Betty the Buyer's letter. It was short—the shortest letter he had ever seen. It contained one line:

"Machines wear out. What of women?"

There was a stamped, addressed envelope. Andrew chewed his pencil-stub. Then he scrawled beneath the single line:

"By gum, that's a fact. So do men, so does everything—in time."

That'll settle her, he thought, yet he knew he would be greatly disappointed if he heard no more from that Betty-person.

He did hear more. Orange envelopes arrived on an average of one a week, and orange envelopes were as often delivered into the hands of the rural carrier. Andrew Josephs had not the slightest idea of buying an electric washer—so he told himself—and all the letters in the world could not convince him that they were necessary for the health and happiness of the women about him—at least, he repeated that again and again to himself.

When one day there came enclosed in the Betty letter a printed bit of paper good for ten dollars on the purchase price of any electric-washer in the store, provided he would be kind enough to send the names of ten or more families in Round Prairie which might be interested in washing-machines, Andrew little dreamed how Betty the Buyer was closing in on him. Andrew could no more resist that ten-dollar gift than he could have refused a gold piece that had been actually placed in his hand. He immediately wrote the names of the ten best families in Round Prairie of milk. Shape without kneading and gently roll quite thin. Use a small cutter as the biscuits should be small.

CHEESE WAFERS.—Cover the tops of salted crackers with grated dairy cheese, sprinkle generously with paprika, add a very little salt, and toast in a quick oven until the cheese is softened. Watch very carefully as they quickly harden after the cheese is melted.

MERINGUE SURPRISE.—Six whites of eggs, two cups of granulated sugar, one teaspoon of vanilla, one-fourth teaspoon of cream of tartar, and one teaspoon of vinegar. Beat the egg-whites until very stiff, add the cream of tartar, and beat again, then gradually add the sugar and beat about fifteen minutes. Lastly, add vanilla and vinegar and beat five minutes more. Line a pan with paraffin paper, pour in the mixture and bake one hour in a very slow oven. When cold, whip one cup of cream, sweeten and spread over the top, and sprinkle with chopped pecan meats. Place on a fancy serving dish, and surround with candy hearts. If preferred, just before serving, the nuts may be omitted, and crushed sweetened strawberries heaped over the top. This pie will keep perfectly for several days in a closely-covered tin box, providing no cream or fruit has been added.

PEANUT BUTTER COOKIES.—Cream together one-half cup of peanut butter and two tablespoons of butter, and beat into it one cup of granulated sugar. Add one egg beaten light and one-half cup of milk. Stir in two cups of flour sifted with four teaspoons of baking powder and one-half teaspoon of salt. Add more flour if necessary, but only sufficient to handle. Shape a little at a time without kneading, roll thin and cut into small rounds. Bake in a quick oven. If desired, a few roasted half peanuts may be pressed into center of each cookie.

JEWISH FRUIT CAKE.—Sift together one-half cup of granulated sugar, one-half cup of flour, one heaping teaspoon of baking powder and one-half teaspoon of salt. Beat the yolks of three eggs to a light yellow and beat in the sugar, then add the three egg whites first beaten stiff and dry. Add one pound of seeded and skinned dates, and one-half pound of English walnut meats chopped fairly fine.

DELICATE CAKE WITH CRIMSON FROSTING.—Sift together one cup of sugar, one and one-half cup of flour, two teaspoons of baking powder, and one-fourth teaspoon of salt. In a measuring cup soften one-fourth of a cup of butter, break two whole eggs onto the butter and fill up the cup with sweet milk. Add this to the dry ingredients and beat hard until smooth and fine grained. Bake in a moderate oven.

FROSTING.—Wash ripe cranberries and heat until the juice is drawn out. Strain through cheese-cloth. To one-half cup of the cranberry juice add one and one-half cup of granulated sugar and a pinch of salt, and boil until a little holds its shape in cold water. Pour gradually over the stiffly-beaten whites of two eggs and beat until smooth and thick. Pour over cold cake.

MAPLE SYRUP FROSTING.—Into the upper part of the double boiler put two-thirds cup of maple syrup and the unbeaten white of one egg. Set into the lower part of the boiler when the water is boiling rapidly, and cook and beat with the egg beater eight minutes. Remove from water and beat until cool enough to spread.

DATES WITH CHEESE STUFFING.—Wash and wipe the dates. Slit one side of dates and remove the pits. Soften cream cheese with a little mayonnaise salad dressing, or canned milk, add chopped nuts, and salt and paprika providing milk is used, beat thoroughly together and fill dates. Keep in a cold place until served.

Three Appetizing Breakfast Dishes

SAUSAGE WITH APPLES.—Wipe and core large tart apples. In the center of each insert a sausage, which should project about half way over the apple, so that the sausage will baste the apple as it cooks. Bake thoroughly in a hot oven. Serve with corn muffins.

CORN MEAL AND POTATO MUFFINS.—One cup of corn meal, three teaspoons of baking powder, three-fourths teaspoon of salt, one tablespoon of sugar, sifted together. Stir in one-half cup of milk, one beaten egg, one tablespoon of melted shortening, and one cup of mashed potato. Beat hard, adding more milk if necessary to make a medium soft batter. Bake in a quick oven. Makes 12 muffins.

CREOLE CODFISH.—Cut salt codfish into small pieces, cover with cold water and let it stand over night. In the morning change the water if the fish is extra salt, bring slowly to the boiling point (but do not let it boil) and hold it there about fifteen minutes. Drain and shred. In a saucepan melt three tablespoons of butter, add one-half of a small onion thinly sliced, stir until tender and lightly browned, and then add half a green sweet pepper chopped fine. When cooking, slowly add four tablespoons of dry flour and when this is well blended, gradually add one pint of boiling hot milk, season with salt and pepper and cook slowly about ten minutes. Add the prepared codfish, and just before serving add one tablespoon of chili sauce.

POTATO AND MEAT CAKES.—These can be prepared the day before, thus making the breakfast a quickly-prepared meal. Put three tablespoons of butter or bacon fat into a frying-pan and in it brown two rounding teaspoons of scraped onion. Set the pan back and rub into the mixture four even tablespoons of dry flour, then gradually add one cup of hot milk, return to fire and constantly stir until it has thickened and then cooked three minutes. Add one and a half cup of cooked chopped meat, and sufficient fresh mashed potato to make the mixture stiff enough to handle. When cool, shape into cakes, roll in slightly-beaten egg, then in crumbs, and set away. Fry brown in fat.

Selecting our Silhouette

SO much talk these days about "silhouettes"! One speaks of "the fashionable silhouette," or "the "new silhouette." Well, let's consider what that means. A silhouette is the shadow thrown by a figure; it is a figure in outline. If you will stand between a light and the wall at night, you will see your silhouette thrown back against the wallpaper. If you stand facing the wall, it will be a blot or blur; if you stand with your side toward the wall, it will be a profile figure. Well, girls, that's your silhouette!

What kind of a silhouette have you? For that determines whether you are fashionable, attractive, of good figure, and many other things.

Suppose you test this out?

An! you find that your shoulders round a little, Patty? And as for you, Ellen, your chin bags beneath! And Ruth's waist pokes out in front, and she sags a little on one side! What disclosures! And what shall we do about them?

Oh, it's very simple. Just take that candle, or lamp or gasjet into your confidence, nightly, and practice standing, lifting the chin, drawing in the abdomen, straightening the spine, until the silhouette on the wall becomes what you feel it should be.

If you are too fat, the lamplight will tell tales at once; if you slouch in standing, there will be the evidence; if you let your shoulders round or your chin drop, the shadows on the wall will do the same.

HAVE YOU A SILHOUETTE LIKE THIS?

Every defect of this kind can be remedied. It is not possible to add inches to your nose, but it is possible to remove extra fat from your cheeks and thus give your small nose a chance. Flesh can be added, removed, round shoulders flattened, abdomens decreased, and every fault of posture remedied. So study your silhouette and see what you need.

The first thing, of course, is to remember the correct way of standing which I have told you so many times; heels together, toes slightly apart, weight of body resting on the balls of the feet, so that the body leans slightly—oh, ever so slightly!—forward, chin lifted easily, shoulders drooped, chest raised, abdomen drawn in, arms hanging easily at sides.

There is a sitting silhouette, also, though more difficult to perceive through shadows. Better examine that by daylight in front of your mirror, and be sure you do not round the shoulders. Keep the chest always raised and you cannot go far wrong.

A good exercise for the back and the abdomen is to stand erect with the legs about eighteen inches apart, the arms raised straight above the head, palms touching each other, elbows rigid. Now breathe in slowly while you count ten. Be sure the back is straight and that you do not hunch forward because of the raised arms. Now throw them down with force, palms still together, and between the legs as far as they will go, exhaling at the same time. Do not bend knees, bend only at waist. Raise the arms slowly, inhaling again as you mentally count ten; throw arms down again, as before. Repeat ten or fifteen times. This is called "Sawing Wood," and is excellent for the reduction of the abdomen, the strengthening of the spine, and for inducing action of the eliminative organs.

Answers to Questions

VIRGINIA.—At your age your hair should not be turning gray, and if it is thin as well, it means that the hair is not properly nourished. I should not use a dye, for the hair never looks natural, and the dye must be repeated and repeated. Also, dyeing hair is a job for the professional, and home-dyed hair is apt to look streaked and unsatisfactory, plainly disclosing what has happened to it. Remember, once you use anything approaching dye on your hair, the damage is done, and you cannot go back to the hair you once had. For that reason I should let dyes alone. What you really need is a general upbuilding of the body so that the scalp gets the nourishment it needs. And you certainly need scalp massage twice daily. So, first, make it your job to eat nourishing food, and plenty of it: cut out foods that are hard to digest, such as pork, veal, fried foods, cabbage, griddle cakes, pie, hot biscuits, and eat instead simple easily digested foods so that you may get from them the most nourishment with the least effort. Have your potatoes baked or boiled and eat them dry and mealy with good fresh butter. Drink milk, eat well-cooked cereal with cream or milk, plenty of fruit, green vegetables, take an extra dish of well-cooked rice with cream and sugar before retiring—that is, unless you are overweight, and I do not believe you are—have your meats roasted or broiled and eat them medium rare. And chew your food until it is liquid. Cut out coffee and tea; don't drink with your meals, but drink a glass of milk just before lunch or breakfast. See that the eliminative organs work properly: drink plenty of water to help them along. Sleep eight or nine hours a night, with fresh air in your room. And, incidentally, massage your scalp night and morning. Dip your finger-tips in olive oil, and after letting the hair down and thoroughly brushing it—though gently; never drag the brush through the hair—slip the fingers of the right hand under the hair at the right of the head, pressing them firmly against the scalp; and the fingers of the left hand at the left of the head, in the same manner. Now move the scalp back and forth on the skull without lifting the fingers. If the scalp is tight and does not seem to move, persevere. The scalp must be loose on the skull to have healthy hair. But remember, no nourishment can be carried to the scalp unless you provide it, and the hair must be fed if it is to stop turning grey. If you will keep at this scalp massage, day in and day out, and after the body health, new hair will begin to come in. And while it is probably too much to expect that the old hair will regain its color—though it did in the case of a friend of mine—yet the new hair will be healthy in color and will in time take the place of the old. This is a longer process than dyeing, but infinitely more satisfactory. So try it, my dear!

BLUE EYES.—Powder will clog the pores unless care is taken to keep them clean. Very young girls should not use powder, as their skins are too pretty in their natural condition. When the nose is shiny, the rubbing on of a little powder is permissible, but be sure that the face is thoroughly cleansed at night. One way of getting around the shiny nose problem is to use rolled oats in little cheese-cloth bags for washing the face. Make the bags about two by three inches, and fill them half full of oats. Dip them quickly in and out of water and wash the face with the damp bag. A milky liquid will ooze forth, and after the face is clean, you should not rub it but pat it dry with a soft cloth. A powdery surface will remain, velvety in appearance, and do away with the need for other powder. This is the milky liquid drying on the face.

VINEN.—Yes, my dear; you do not weigh enough for your height. I should try to gain about 25 pounds. I expect that sounds like a big job, but it isn't so very, if you will just keep at it. The first thing to remember is that some foods make fat and some do not, and that some ways of cooking food let the stomach get all the nourishment with little effort, and that other ways make it so hard for the stomach to get the nourishment out of food that it lets half of it get by without extracting any flesh-building elements from it. So, first, choose your foods properly; then cook them properly. Now, we want to gain weight, so we must choose the kind of foods which make fat. You should eat for breakfast a great bowl of well-cooked cereal with plenty of milk or cream, preferably the latter if you can get it. Make a real breakfast from this, with some bread and butter or buttered toast, and some fruit. Chew the bread until it is liquid. Drink a glass of milk with it, and if you want it, eat a soft-boiled egg. Never eat hard-boiled or fried eggs; they make too much work for your stomach and you do not get the same food value from them. That breakfast is a thoroughly healthful one, and if you have taken a couple of glasses of water after getting up in the morning, and will drink two more in the morning, two more in the afternoon, and two some time after your evening meal, you will be helping things along very nicely. For your midday meal—which I suppose is your heavy meal—eat some baked potatoes, or boiled potatoes, with butter, some green vegetables, such as string beans (not cooked with meat, however, but boiled until tender in plenty of boiling salted water), lettuce, peas, spinach or other greens, beets, tomatoes, summer squash, carrots, etc., etc. For dessert, baked custard, blanc mange, baked apples, or apple sauce, stewed prunes (soaked over night, after washing, then cooked slowly until very soft), ice cream, corn-starch pudding, rice pudding, tapioca pudding, etc. Eat these puddings with cream or milk when you can. Any berries, or melons, peaches, pears, etc., make good desserts. For your evening meal, bread and milk make a fine dish, with some fruit for dessert. Or a baked potato, large and fat, and plenty of bread and butter, and some fruit. An extra dish of rice, sugar and milk or cream, taken before you go to bed will help to add pounds to your weight. Your pimples and your sallow complexion will disappear in a short time if you persevere in drinking lots of water, eating fruit, and bathing the body daily. I did not mention meats for your midday meal, but of course meat is desirable for strength. Bacon is all right for you, chicken, roasted, or broiled—but not fried—or broiled or baked fish, or broiled or roasted meat. Pork and veal are hard to digest, so must be chewed very thoroughly indeed, and are better left alone, where one is trying hard to gain. Beef, mutton and lamb are good meats for you, if roasted or broiled, and eaten not too well done. The wrinkles under your eyes come from not having flesh or fat enough under your skin to stretch the skin properly. Go to work and add as many pounds as you can and you will find the wrinkles disappearing. Your bust is too small for your waist and hips, but that will increase as you build your body up. Your bust and hips should be the same measurement, and the waist ten inches smaller. If you wear a corset, be sure you put it on right so that you do not push the flesh down around the hips and make them too large for the rest of your body. Unlace the corset—that is, loosen the strings out wide—then slip the corset on and fasten up the front, fasten the corset garters to the stockings, then lace the corset, or rather draw the lacings of the corset to fit the figure. You will find this difficult to do unless you put your corset strings in properly in the first place. Find the middle of the string, and put that at the top of the corset; then lace in the ordinary way until you reach the waist-line, when instead of crossing over with your string, put each string through the hole just below it, and again start lacing across until you reach about four or five inches below the waist, when do the same thing again. This will give you a loop to pull at each side of the waist, and a loop to pull about half way below the waist, each side of the corset. Of course if you wear a short corset, there will be no room for this lower loop, and you will only lace it in this way at the waist-line. After you have fastened the front and the garters, you will then pull down the loops in the back until the corset is adjusted to the figure. Unlace before taking off—that is, loosen the lacings before taking off. In this way no superfluous flesh will be pushed down on the hips, and the figure will be kept in proportion. As to the itching head, shampoo once in two weeks with a shampoo liquid made by shaving half a bar of white household soap into a quart of boiling water and keeping it on the stove until dissolved. Lather the head with a little of this at a time, rinse off, lather again, rubbing hair and scalp thoroughly, then rinse many times. Dry in the sun, brush gently. You have been using a sharp comb or a stiff brush on your scalp. That will irritate it. Every night dip your finger-tips in olive oil, lightly, and massage the scalp as I have directed "Virginia."

ALMA.—Superfluous hair on the face should be treated carefully, as most depilatories only bring the hair back more noticeably. It is safe and sure to use peroxide of hydrogen one day to dampen the hairy spots, and ammonia the next day. Keep this up until the hair disappears. It is a slow process, but the peroxide bleaches the hair and the ammonia dries it up. Under the arms it is permissible to use a depilatory, which means that it must be taken off every little bit. I should use nothing on my face at all, unless I had a real growth. Many young girls exaggerate the light down that we all have on our faces, and undertake to remove that; very often only aggravating the condition. There is nothing unbeautiful about a little down on the face; it is only when the hair becomes black and mustachey, or long and noticeable, that one need do anything about it. Examine closely the faces of the people you know and whom you think quite good looking and you will find that practically all of them have hair in some form on their faces, yet you never noticed it before. People do not notice any small amount of hair you may have, either.

MOTHER.—Your hair is splitting and growing thin because your body is not nourishing it sufficiently. The fact that you nurse your baby, as of course you should, means that you need yourself a great deal more nourishment than ordinary in order to feed her and keep your own body up to normal. So try your best to take more nourishment; milk, well-cooked cereal, boiled rice with sugar and cream, soft-boiled eggs, baked potatoes. Be sure that the bowels function. Get all the sleep you possibly can. After you have weaned the baby, it will be easier, but even then you must be careful to keep well-fed, and well taken care of. You need sleep, food. The hair probably does not need any special local treatment—it is only crying out for food, just as your baby would if you neglected it. So answer that cry, by systematically pouring easily digested food into your body at regular intervals—milk, cream, cereals, fruits, lean medium rare meat, bacon, green vegetables, fresh fruits. Be your own patient and treat yourself well.

LOUISE.—French heels are not at all fashionable except for dancing pumps or slippers. For street wear, a quite low flat heel is the most worn by fashionable women; for those who are short, a high heel but of military shape—that is, with a large base instead of the small French base. Your height does not require anything of the kind; you should be both fashionable and comfortable by choosing low heels. Even for your pumps and slippers, I should choose what they call the opera heel—which is a sort of French heel, that is with a small base—but only half the ordinary height of this kind of heel. This is a very fashionable heel, except for short women or those who have an arch which is not comfortable in a low heel. For walking, never under any circumstances wear a high heel—it is distinctly unfashionable as well as unhealthful. No, my dear, you do not weigh too much—you could even stand a few more pounds!

is nice for starting all garden plants and every home should grow flowers. I love flowers, children and chickens and they get every minute of my spare time.

I raise the single comb brown Leghorn chickens and I find them extra good layers. I would not raise a mixed breed of chickens as so many farm women do. I have read of the Golden Wyandottes and would like to learn more about that breed. Every woman that lives where there is plenty of space can raise the large breeds to furnish meat for the table and the smaller breed for eggs.

I must hurry now for Mrs. Wilkinson will shoo at me.

With love to all the kind sisters,

MRS. F. F. MULLIKIN.

ARAGO, MINN.

DEAR SISTERS AND MRS. WILKINSON:

I can promise not to take up much room if you will only let me come in, for I weigh only a little over one hundred pounds. And I'll only stay a minute for I get tired so soon, not tired of your company (that couldn't happen) but I'm a semi-invalid, have been for the past four years, and cannot stay up long.

I come to ask a favor of you all. I'd like to have the sisters send me post-cards, and I hope you will even though I shall not be able to answer them. My reason for asking this is to help pass away the long, idle hours. I hear someone whisper that they have no idle hours. I wouldn't either if I were well and strong but I've been in bed most of the time since I was taken sick. Some days I feel quite well, then I do fancy work. I like to crochet, tat, knit and do raffia work. Can make pretty paper flowers and we make lots of trimmings for our Christmas tree. I also mend and patch but the sisters don't generally mention that branch of fancy work though I am sure they all have to do it. On the days that I am too tired to do these things I read and it is for those days of which there are many, that I want to look at your post-cards. My birthday is in June but I will not ask for a birthday shower as this letter may not appear until after that, and, besides, I like a variety of views and will ask each of you to choose what you like best to send me.

I live on a farm of 250 acres, twelve miles from Park Rapids. This is noted for summer resorts as there is such pretty scenery, lots of lakes and fine fishing. The Itasca State Park is only nineteen miles from my home and there is where the Mississippi River begins its long journey. There are all kinds of wild animals in the park, including elk, moose, deer and bear. Many tourists come here every summer and mamma earns pin money by selling fresh vegetables to them. We have one acre of ground for a garden and raise everything for our own use for summer and winter. Mamma cans a big winter supply of vegetables and fruits and in winter we can mincemeat, fresh beef, soup, cure and smoke pork and also fry down fresh sausages and pork chops for summer use.

Mamma does all the sewing and knitting for a family of nine, besides sending three children to school and taking care of me, so don't you think she is pretty busy? The children help her all they can but they haven't much time as we live two and one-half miles from school so they must leave home early and it is late before they get back. We have a covered rig with a stove in it for cold weather.

Some Danger Signals of Babyhood

HERETOFORE each topic that I have chosen as the subject of a monthly talk in this department has taken all the space that could be spared for that purpose in a single issue and sometimes had to be continued in the following number, but this month my little lecture will cover several matters no less important for parents to know about though requiring less space for explanation. If parents will heed these cautions and instructions it will enable them in many a case to save baby from life-long suffering or maybe from immediate fatal consequences.

As soon as baby is born, a few drops of one per cent. solution of nitrate of silver or twenty per cent. solution of argyrol should be dropped in baby's eyes, taking care to get the solution well under each lid. This should be done by the doctor or nurse in attendance but, although required by law in many of the States, it is sometimes neglected, and such neglect may, and sometimes does, result in the child becoming totally blind for life. Therefore the parents should see to it that this precautionary treatment, the importance of which cannot be overestimated, be promptly administered in every case to prevent possible infection of a nature that might destroy the baby's sight. The statistics of blindness in babies are almost unbelievable, and when we stop to think that many, if not all, these cases of infant blindness are preventable by this simple means we realize that neglect is unpardonable.

Another important thing to bear in mind is the proper tying of the cord, as there is great danger of hemorrhage if this is not properly done. Also see that the abdominal band is properly put on, with the end of the cord pinting upward toward the chin. The abdominal band will support the weak abdominal muscles if baby cries or strains. The cord stump can be well covered with clean absorbent cotton, which dries it up quickly as anything, and this is the object to be realized. The greasy rag so often used is not an absorbent and there is great danger of infection. The stump of the cord dries up in about five days. In washing baby notice if the navel protrudes, and I speak of this because often if baby cries a great deal you may get an umbilical hernia. This is not serious if noticed and properly treated. The treatment is to take a button about one inch in diameter, covering it with absorbent cotton, the rounded or convex surface being covered to make it soft and unirritating; with this press the navel in and hold the button there with strips of adhesive plaster put on so as to form a cross. This dressing if properly applied holds the parts in their normal position and you soon get the parts strongly healed. You can change the cotton and adhesive plaster often enough to keep them clean, and if this is worn a few months you can cure the hernia and thereby eliminate the necessity of an operation or truss to hold it in position. An umbilical hernia in young babies is not an uncommon condition.

Just a few words in regard to leaving medicine, pins, screws, etc., around where baby can get hold of them and swallow them, as you all know the first thing a baby tries to do with anything is to put it into its mouth. It ought not to be necessary to speak of this as everyone knows of these dangers and the unfortunate sad results we hear about so often, but our object in referring to it is to increase your vigilance.

There should be a shelf or closet for all medicines and each bottle or box ought to be properly marked or labeled. If a baby is taken suddenly ill we always have to take into consideration the possibility of its being poisoned by some medicine taken unbeknown to anyone, or of its being infected or injured by some foreign body it has swallowed.

Volumes have been written about feeding the baby and everyone seems to agree that the ideal food for a baby is the healthy mother's milk. If for some reason it is not possible for the mother to nurse the baby, we have to consider cow's milk and the different baby foods. Modified cow's milk may seem to be an ideal food, but one danger that we have to consider is that the cow may not be healthy, may be tubercular. In some States the cows are tested and examined, but I am sorry to say that this is not the law all over the country. Without doubt in many cases where modified milk does not agree with baby it is on account of the milk not being right. Let us hope that this can be overcome and that these poor helpless babies will not be exposed to the danger of drinking milk from diseased cows. A baby properly fed and given the proper amount of exercise and sleep out in the open air will not have many of the ailments that cause us so much worry and trouble, and is less susceptible to even the infectious and contagious diseases.

Many of the deformities of babies, especially of their feet, if properly treated can easily be corrected before they are two years old. Often at this early age, a corrected deformity held in position by a plaster of Paris cast for a few weeks will save an operation later on in life, and with better hopes for a perfect result. It is a solemn duty that parents owe their children, that they start them in life well equipped physically, their future education depending on the financial condition of their parents and the ambition of the child.

It is an impossibility to keep education away from one who has the ambition and courage to go out for it.

Subject for our next month's talk: "Summer Diseases of Babies."

Questions and Answers

FEEDING BABY.—I would like to know what to feed my baby and how often, as I am going to wean her. She does not get sleep enough, going to sleep at 8 P. M., awakening several times during the night, then gets up at 6.30 A. M., gets one or two hours sleep during day. MRS. C. V. H., Mt. Vernon, Ill.

A.—Feeding a baby after weaning depends or varies a little according to its age. If only a few weeks old I should suggest at first: milk, two ounces; water, four ounces; sugar of milk, one-half teaspoonful; keep increasing the milk until at six months the baby is taking equal parts of milk and water, as follows: milk, three ounces; water, three ounces; sugar of milk, one teaspoonful; lime-water, one tablespoonful. You keep on increasing the proportion of milk until at the ninth month the baby is taking pure milk, with lime-water, one tablespoonful to three ounces.

Until the baby is three months old, it should be fed every two hours, during day, one or two feedings during night, but after third month, feed every three hours, and no night feedings. This is a good rule to follow, but you must follow it with reason, and if the baby falls asleep and does not get a good meal at bedtime and awakens in the night hungry, feed it by all means, although night feeding after the third or fourth month as a regular thing is not advisable. Babies can become like night-watchmen, eating during night-time and keeping its guardian awake.

Milk is a good food at any age; after weaning baby, oatmeal gruel, cream of wheat, stale wheat bread toasted, baked potato, coddled egg, chicken broth, meat soups not greasy, are all good in addition to milk.

Most of the trouble of babies lying awake nights is caused by their being hungry, the want of food, or the indigestion gas caused by taking food that does not digest properly. MRS. E. B., Forston, Minn., MRS. W. L. H., Lehi, Utah, MRS. B. F., Brandenburg, Ky., please read the foregoing in answer to your inquiries.

INDIGESTION.—My babies are fat at birth, but soon get thin, weighing less at four months of age than at birth. They never seem sick, but constipated, vomiting milk three hours after nursing. Will you please tell me the cause and relief.

MRS. M. M., Mt. Olive, Miss.

A.—A nursing mother should keep her own bowels and digestion in a normal condition and the baby's will be normal.

Would suggest that you be careful what you eat, and take two teaspoonfuls of elix. lactated pepsin, after each meal, and if the baby does not improve, wean it and put her on modified milk. Have baby sleep and exercise out in the open air all that is possible.

SORES, ERUPTIONS FROM ANEMIA AND MALNUTRITION.—What can I do for my five-months-old baby that has sores, eruptions on head and face and itches very badly? MRS. V. K., Herbster, Wisc.

A.—Should give him syrup of iodide of iron, two drops, three times a day, in water. Should wash parts twice a day with Dakins' solution, then apply a little sulphur ointment. Please read the foregoing: Mrs. J. L. L., Guernsey, Wyo., also Mrs. C. I., Mannington, W. Va.

CLOTHING FOR BABY.—Should a baby born in May wear wool or silk shirts? Should I get outing gowns or nainsook? MRS. J. H., Sapulpa, Okla.

A.—Should advise the woolen shirts as they absorb quickly. I think the outing preferable to nainsook.

FONTANELLES CLOSING.—My baby girl is three months old and when she was born, the soft place on her head was the size of a ten-cent piece. They tell me if this closes too quickly, she will die, or not be right mentally. Is this true? She is very bright and healthy now.

MRS. N. B. V., Seward, Alaska.

A.—The gradual closing of the fontanelles is a natural physiological act, and will not cause your baby girl any trouble or affect her mental condition.

NIGHT SWEATS.—Can you tell me the cause and relief of my five-months-old baby sweating at night until his clothing is wet?

MRS. M. W., Tanner, W. Va.

A.—Night sweats are a symptom of some severe constitutional disease like tuberculosis, or a serious run-down condition, but may be of nervous origin. Would suggest examination by some competent physician to find the cause in your baby's case.

RICKETS.—What can I feed my eleven-months-old baby who has rickets, as she does not seem to gain. One side is higher than the other, and her head sweats a great deal. Should she take a tonic?

MRS. M. E. H., Outlook, Mont.

A.—Should put her on a nourishing diet, cow's milk, cream, beef juice squeezed from fresh steak, broths, stale bread-crumbs in milk, and have her out of doors all you can. There is, in such cases, usually a lack of salts in the body, so put two or three tablespoonfuls of lime-water in milk or other liquid foods per day; also give a few grains of bicarbonate of soda in her food. Give her one teaspoonful of Maltine and Cod Liver Oil, three times a day.

CONSTIPATION AND INDIGESTION.—What can I do for my four-months-old baby, as he throws up his food, does not seem to digest it? He slobbers all the time and bites his hands.

MRS. A. S., Ky.

A.—Keep your own bowels regular and your digestion normal and your nursing baby's will be the same. Take Nujol in teaspoonful doses often enough to keep bowels regular, or teaspoonful doses of fluid extract of cascara sagrada.

The slobbering and biting his hands would indicate that he was teething.

DIET DURING PREGNANCY AND AFTER: BABY'S BAND.—What foods should a mother avoid during pregnancy and after confinement? How long should a baby wear its band?

MRS. C. E., Abbeville, Ga.

A.—During pregnancy a mother should have a good generous diet, avoiding any foods that cause indigestion and gas, being especially careful to keep bowels regular and to know that kidneys are performing their proper functions.

After confinement the same suggestion would hold good, only that she must take milk and other liquids in the amounts needed to furnish proper food for the baby.

If baby has indigestion and gas, the mother must avoid acids and indigestible foods. (b) Baby should wear band two years, or until it gets its teeth.

UNDERWEIGHT, ANEMIA.—I have a boy seven years old who weighs 35 pounds, has yellow, sallow complexion. He eats heartily, but on meats and sweets. Please suggest diet and treatment.

MRS. E. E. A., Winters, Texas.

A.—Your boy's color would indicate a torpid liver, and I would sugest cutting down of the sugars and fats, that is the meats and sweets. Have him take milk, three or four glasses each day, vegetables, cereals with cream, and not much sugar. Should give him teaspoonful doses of Neoferrum, three times a day after meals.

SUCKING THUMBS, BIRTHMARKS, AFTERNOON CRYING SPELLS.—Will it cause my baby's mouth or fist to be ugly shaped if baby sucks his fist, and how can I stop it? (b) What causes birthmarks, and how can they be removed? (c) What causes my baby to cry late in the afternoon and evening?

MRS. C. L. B., Ranseur, N. C.

A.—Sucking the thumb or fist is a harmless matter and will not cause any deformity. Any harmless preparation that tastes badly, like vinegar or alum, put on fist will usually stop the sucking of thumb or fist.

(B) We do not believe in birthmarks, but if your baby has any disfiguring mark, any abnormal growth, both of which are caused by pressure, or disturbed cell formation, go to some competent surgeon and he will advise you what to do. There is no general suggestion or advice that would be applicable to all cases.

(C) A baby, or even adult, becomes tired in the late afternoon and evening, and at times may become irritable.

Mrs. L. H., Swan Quarter, N. C., please read the foregoing.

BOW-LEGS.—What can I do for a baby eighteen months old who is bow-legged?

MRS. M., Liberty, Tenn.

A.—You can do a whole lot for him by massage, rubbing, of course using your pressure so as to correct deformity. If you do not get perfect result from this persistent rubbing, have your physician correct the shape of the legs, by extreme pressure under ether, put on plaster of Paris bandage, and have him wear it six weeks. Do not encourage baby to walk until he is stronger.

SUCKING LIP.—What can I do for my five-months-old baby, who sucks his lip all the time?

MRS. G. S., Trent, Texas.

A.—This is one of the almost unaccountable habits that babies take up. Stop him doing it whenever you can, giving him rubber ring or something to suck and he will soon give up the habit.

I said Ed only stay a minute and I'm like the little boy whose mother asked him how many seconds there were in a minute. He said: "Which kind do you mean, mother, a regular minute or one of those great, long wait-a-minnfes? That's the kind I meant.

With best wishes and good luck to all,

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for only a few months but after seeing a sister's letter requesting the ideas of others on remarriage, I decided to write of my own experience and let her judge for herself.

At the age of eighteen I was left a widow with two babies, one seventeen months old and one just a week old. I went home to father and mother but it was no longer home to me after having had one of the dearest men and homes in the world. Besides, I felt as though I were imposing and in the way. A year after my husband's death I met a man who loved me and wanted me to marry him. I also cared for him. At first I thought of the children for I did not want to run the risk of having them misused. He said he loved my babies and would be a regular father to them so we were married. The children loved him from the first and he is always ready to wait on their many wants and answer their childish questions. They think Daddy is the only one ever and will do anything for him and mind him better than they will me. We also have a baby boy, eight months old. I have never regretted my second marriage for a minute as my husband is so good to us all.

But I will say if you are not sure this man loves children, don't marry him for a man who doesn't care for children won't care for those that aren't his own.

Now for a bit about myself. I am in the twenties, five feet, three inches tall, weigh 110 pounds, have grey eyes and auburn hair.

Best wishes to all readers. MRS. J. G. KRAKE.

Laddie of Mine

By Clara Miehm

There's a little house on the hilltop
Snuggled closely among the trees
And every eve, at twilight,
A song wafts out on the breeze.
A song that is glad, yet lonely,
But filled with a hope divine;
It's the little old lady singing,
"Laddie, dear laddie of mine."

Will you come home in the springtime,
Or will it be in the fall?
But laddie was many a mile away
And never came home at all.
He sleeps in the land of the Lilies
With other lads, stalwart and fine,
The little old lady keeps singing,
"Laddie, dear laddie of mine."

Her eyes with sad tears grow dimmer,
Her hopes and her dreams all die,
Though she knows she will meet her laddie
In the sweet, sweet by and by,
Far away from the land of the Lilies,
Far away from the battle line,
Still she keeps singing and singing,
"Laddie, dear laddie of mine."

He sleeps in the land of the Lilies;
She sleeps in the land of the Free,
For death called, and she answered
Gently, with sweet humility.
And she never knew that her laddie,
In France 'neath a sheltering pine,
Heard her sing, as he dreamed in the shadows,
"Laddie—dear laddie of mine."

The Mother

"She never touched with skillful brush the canvas,
And left a picture that the world might praise,
Or, with inspired fingers on the keyboard,
Sent down an echo through the length of days.

But once with eyes tearstained yet looking upward,
With smiling lips she passed beneath the rod,
Descending almost to the Vale of Shadows,
To bring a little newborn soul from God.

"She never sang a song of joy or sadness,
In clear, sweet tones, to make us smile or weep,
Her voice, too weak to win the world's approval,
Was only good to hush a babe to sleep.

"She never penned a book whose glowing pages
Might lift us up and help us in the fight,
But day by day she sought with loving patience
To guide two little stumbling feet aright.

"And yet, mayhap when at the gate of Heaven
She paused, God looked at her and smiled,
With hand outstretched, His kind voice spoke a welcome
To her, the mother of a little child."

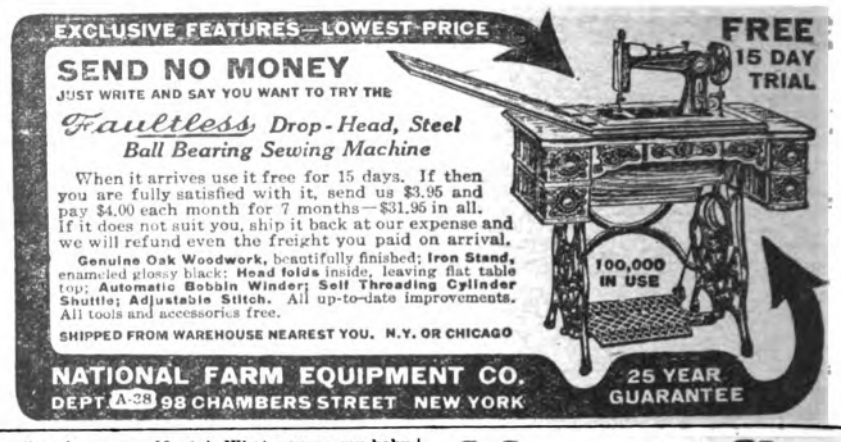
NORWICH, 8 West Railroad St., N. Y.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for only four months but I wish to reply to Lena's letters. My life has been practically the same as hers, for the last seven years. My husband was extremely jealous of my first husband's children; he thought I cared more for them than I did for him and it wasn't long before I had reason for feeling that way. He was the best man in the world to me when he didn't feel jealous but I was not allowed to speak to men, or women either at times. I tried to live a Christian life and if I brought up this subject I was ridiculed. Now I will tell you what I did: I left. After some time my imaginary conscience told me I was doing wrong by not taking him for better or for worse and I took him back, only to live the same life over. I did that several times until I was just ruining my children's happiness and my own, too. It was a hard thing to do but the last time he came back I refused to see him and although today he is dead, I really feel no regret for not trying it all over again.



A little poem I like is:

"What's the use of ever sighing,
Might as well go long and smile,
Life, our longest, greatest sorrow,
Only lasts a little while."

Surely my letter does not read like "Heartbroken's" does it, but I am not heartbroken. I have a great peace of mind and know that God knows all and sees all. I can hold my religious belief now and I have learned the great lesson of not to worry. Actually, I do not worry over a thing. God says, "Ask, expecting to receive and you will receive." My advice to you is to get so close to God that you can feel His love and He will tell you what to do.

I am a middle-aged woman, past forty, work every week day in a mill to support two children and do my housework at night. I do not work on Sunday. I find I always lose before the week is over if I work on Sunday. I am perfectly happy and contented and each night I thank God for our health, our eyesight

Morris. Why, I have met the man myself."

"But your father may have borrowed his name?"

"Even that would give no account for the length of time that she has been under Doctor Judson's care—thirty years and more. Is that no proof?"

"Strong proof—insurmountable proof! But what reason has he for doubting your paternity?"

"Only that it would seem impossible for a father to practice so cruel a deception on his own child, not to speak of the humiliation and disgrace that he has put upon me. Even the most depraved of parents will save a daughter the shame that he has forced upon me."

"That creates hope, certainly, but offers no proof, and it is not sentimentality but reality that we are trying to discover now. I don't want to hurt you, dear, but I will not advise you to think too strongly of this mistaken parentage. Those things sometimes occur; but they are cases which are few in number, and happen more often in novels than in real life. Can we go and see Doctor Judson now?"

"He told me to bring you as soon as you came."

"Then I should like to go over all the ground with him at once. Let us go."

She arose immediately, and standing there with the declining sun making shadows among the shrubbery about her, she exclaimed:

"Yes; let us go! I am impatient to know all that is possible for me to know, and to hear what you will have to say to each other. But I shall not hear for praying—praying to the God of the helpless that it may prove true that I am not the daughter of Paul Reade, that I am not the offspring of a scoundrel and a thief!"

A sudden exclamation caught their attention, and turning, Marian saw Mrs. King. She had fallen against a trunk of a tree, and half-lay there, looking up at her with wildly startled eyes. Marian sprang toward her and lifted her gently.

"What is it?" she asked. "Have you hurt yourself? Are you ill?"

"No, no!" gasped the woman. "I thought you were in the house. I was passing here, and I heard your last words. Tell me quickly! What Paul Reade was it of whom you spoke? Name something by which I can know! What is your own first name, and what was his mother's?"

"My name is Marian. His mother's is Janet."

The words were scarcely coherent under excitement; but Mrs. King understood.

"It must be!" she panted—"it must be! God has sent me deliverance at last! If it is the Paul Reade who has wrecked my life, then he is not your father, child, but I—I, the unfortunate, wretched creature who have scarcely seen the light of day for sixteen long years—I, whom he has kept confined as he would a dog that was mad—I, who have suffered as no human being ever did and retained her reason—I am your mother!"

CHAPTER XXXII.

MRS. KING'S STORY.

Marian looked from Underwood to Mrs. King and back again in the utmost bewilderment. It seemed to her that she had run the gamut of surprises, surprises that were horrible and those that were pleasurable; but, surely, this was the greatest of all.

She could think of nothing to say, remember nothing that she should do, and even Underwood, losing the characteristic presence of mind of manhood, seemed stunned, and for the moment as completely at sea as if he, too, were a hysterical woman.

But he recovered himself more quickly than Marian, and, going forward hastily, he lifted Mrs. King and stood her on her feet.

"You are nervous and excited," he said soothingly. "This coincidence is very strange, certainly, and requires careful investigation, but you must wait until you are better able to be coherent on the subject. Let me take you to your room."

Mrs. King smiled faintly. She leaned heavily upon him, trembling violently, but there was more of calmness in her voice than in her manner, as she replied:

"Yes, I am both excited and nervous; but the worst is over now. I have waited too long to let this opportunity go. I can wait no longer. Silence would be the greatest possible torture to me now. It would increase my excitement to hysteria. Don't try to stop me now. Let us go on with the explanation. There can be no rest until that is done."

She put out her hand to Marian with the same faint smile still resting upon her lips, and with something like a feeling of awe Marian took it, raised it to her lips, noting how thin and transparent it was; then she held it in a warm, close clasp, and assisted Underwood as he led Mrs. King to the seat they had vacated.

"Since you will have it so," he said indulgently, "we may as well go on; but had our conversation not best take place here?"

"Yes," assented Mrs. King. "Let me tell you the story of my life here; then, if it should prove that I am wrong, that this young girl's life has no connection whatever with mine, at least, I may trust you to keep silent upon the subject until my mission will have been accomplished."

"You may trust us to help you all that lies in our power," answered Underwood kindly. "But from what has already been said, I think I am justified in adding that I don't believe you will discover that the story of your life is unconnected with hers."

He placed Mrs. King upon the seat and sat beside her, while Marian knelt in the long grass at her feet, still holding the hand that had been firmly extended to her. The girl's cheeks were flushed, and her eyes were dancing with excitement. Nothing of creation was ever more beautiful than she appeared, as she knelt there in the waning light.

Mrs. King bent forward and kissed her upon the lips, looking into the lovely eyes with an affection that could belong to none but a mother. Her heart was speaking, while the proof remained mute; but motherhood flows silently from the soul, and needs no court of justice to make knowledge perfect.

She looked into the sweet face for some moments in silence, and then she turned more quietly to Underwood.

"You see, I am quite calm now," she said gently. "I have endured so much that nothing has the power to upset me long. I have learned resignation. I had ceased to hope to ever again behold the face of my child, and yet I know that, in spite of all doubt, I am looking at her now. I believe that I intuitively knew it the moment that I looked into her eyes. I believe my mother-heart knew its offspring before my lips had spoken one word to her."

She was silent for a moment again, looking earnestly at Marian, and Underwood did not have the heart to bid her not to hope, whatever his masculine practicality might have thought. He did not speak, but waited for her to continue.

It was to him that she told the story, to him that her eyes were directed, even while she held Marian's hand closest, even when she felt the tender arm steal about her waist, and felt the breath of her own child upon her cheek.

"It is useless," she began, "to go back into the past further than Marian's birth, and, therefore, I shall only say of those days that I was married to a man whom I did not appreciate. I was young and foolish; he, wise, wealthy, and beyond his first youth. He was a man who loved his books, loved science, loved art, loved research, while I thought only of society and flattery. I shall not try to spare myself in this recital, for at least the misery of the past has taught me justice.

"I loved Horace Morehead. I know it now, though then, in my blind foolishness, I told myself that I hated him. I was jealous of his books, jealous of his friends, jealous of anything that took his time and attention from me. But I had so little experience that I understood nothing of all that. He was so wise, that it seemed to me that he must despise me for my ignorance, and in hating myself, I believed that I hated him.

"But all this while I did not try to improve myself. I did not strive to make myself the more his companion. I only lived the more for dress and fashion, striving to make myself believe I did not care. But it grew to be a bitter burden to me, and my hatred for him grew until it seemed almost a mania—this thing which I called hatred, but which was only the most senseless, inane jealousy.

"And then my baby was born! For a time I hoped that would win him from his habits of seclusion, but after the first flush of paternity was over he seemed to forget us both—baby and me—and was more deeply buried in his books than ever before. I resented this as never woman did. My whole nature and womanhood rose in rebellion.

"I have neglected to tell you that at this time we were living in New Orleans, and to that city came a young and handsome man, who seemed to comprise in his person everything which my husband most admired. He was a dilettante in almost every line. He wrote poetry that found favor with the press. He had written a book, the sound philosophy of which had pleased my husband, even before he met the author. He was something of an artist, certainly a connoisseur of art, and a clever, though not a great, musician.

"While I was still an invalid he became a frequent visitor at the house. My husband always welcomed him royally, and while the greater part of his time was passed in the study, I observed that the period passed in the drawing-room or the nursery—for he had obtained the position of friend of the household—seemed the happiest one to him. That man was Paul Reade!

"Oh! how can I go on? How can I tell you of the insidious manner in which he poisoned my mind still more against my husband? How can I tell you of the daily intercourse in which he seemed to me the personification of all that man should be? My indignation against my husband was growing with each hour, and against that background I seemed to see nothing but perfection in Paul Reade. And then the time came when I knew that he—loved me!

"He did not tell me in words, but he let me see it in every act of his daily life. He let me see it in every tender little attention that man can pay to woman. He let me read it in the contrast between him and my husband. He did not speak to me of my husband's neglect, but he made me feel his sympathy, and he knew me well enough to understand that while I would have resented any spoken words, his unuttered sympathy touched my heart in its most vulnerable point.

"And then when my baby was less than six months old, her father died suddenly."

Mrs. King paused. The horror that had come into her eyes as she continued the recital had increased. She felt the arm that encircled her waist grow tighter, and it gave her strength to continue, though her voice was fainter as she went on. No one else spoke, and no voice save hers broke the stillness.

"I did not realize even then that I loved him more than all the world. I did not understand that the loss I had sustained was one that would affect my whole after-life. The doctors called it disease of the heart, and he was buried. He had not even bidden me good night on the night that he died, and my resentment was there even against the dead. And then—well, Paul Reade was more than ever my friend, my protector, my—I blush to say it—lover!

"I need not recount all that time. I need not particularize the means that he used to accomplish his ends. I believed that my husband had never loved me. I believed that Paul Reade did, and with my foolish heart crying out for the affection that had been denied it through all those years of my young life, I yielded to his entreaties, and when my baby's father had been in his grave scarce six months, I became the wife of another man!

"But I was ashamed of it. Somehow, I felt that I had brought disgrace on that little life by giving it two fathers when it was scarcely one year old; and I persuaded Paul to take me away from New Orleans. He consented. Seeing how I felt, he proposed that he should tell his relatives that we had been married four years before and that Marian was his own child. Since that marriage was legal, I saw no objection to that, and since Paul Reade had been away from his native state for more than three years there was no reason why it should not be successfully carried out.

"We agreed upon that plan. We took the fortune which my husband had left to his wife and child, and for six months we traveled about the country—in Europe, and over half the world. It was then that I learned the true character of Paul Reade. I discovered him to be a thief—a gambler! He was kind enough to me until I refused to give him money, and then the man's fiendish temper broke out, and I knew that my master had found me through physical force.

"Then I began to realize what Horace Morehead had been to me. I began to understand how I had loved him. I began to see how much a man he really had been, and I loathed myself that I had not been a better wife; that I had not tried to comprehend him, that I had not striven to be a companion instead of a drag upon him. He grew then to be a sort of god to me, and I worshiped his memory as I had really worshiped him in life without knowing it.

"This seems, I know, like mere sentiment, and a man can never forgive the hanging of destiny upon sentiment; but it is only the groundwork of what occurred later. The money, which had seemed ample in the beginning, became scarcer and scarcer. The constant drain, which was indeed terrible, with nothing added from any source, had well-nigh exhausted the supply, for Paul's losses, notwithstanding his dishonest principles at cards, were something stupendous. And then one day the end came.

FAMILY FAULTS

By Jean O'Brien

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

ONCE I heard a boy of eighteen say, laughingly, "This is why boys leave home." He said it after his mother had opened his mail one morning. She only smiled and said, "Oh, I knew you couldn't be getting any important letters."

I have known many sisters who open their brother's mail, and many brothers who give their sister's letters the "once over." A most serious fault. What is intolerable conduct in a stranger, is still more intolerable from a near relative with whom one must live every day.

But of this mail-opening I have not heard nearly so many complaints as of another thing. The most awful family failing, and the most prevalent, to judge by observation as well as hearsay, is the sin, yes, the sin, of trying to appropriate one member's friend or friends, to destroy the sacredness of individual friendship, and to make the friend of one, the common and no longer sacred companion, of a whole family.

It should be plain to every person of even ordinary intelligence that the friend who loves one member of a family can hardly adore the whole group. It should be quite as plain, therefore, that the friend, who calls often, is not interested, save through politeness, in the others.

Individual friendships should be more sacred in a home than elsewhere, for if a girl or boy, man or woman, cannot reveal individuality there, then he or she must pose all through life.

It is often true, unfortunately, that a friend recognizes talents and virtues in one of the family which the other members did not know existed. To live all one's life with another is not always enough to know that other.

Friendship is the world's greatest talent-discoverer. The brightest spot in every great man's, in every great woman's life, is friendship. Is not the family big enough, great enough, to leave this wonderful gift to any one of their group? Do not forget the biting sarcasm of the old phrase, "One can choose his friends, but not his relations."

For the sake of unity of family groups, for the sake of hospitality, all of you who live in a family recognize and respect the rights of others to their friends. Don't let your constant presence be a restraint to friendly converse. Don't urge your own friends to meet your family too often. People in families lose many friends by this urging. Recognize even a child's right to the affection of friends. Don't try to get the child's friends for your own.

Acknowledge that every member of a family has a right to individual friends. Just as every member, when circumstances permit, has a right to an individual room.

If you get so far as to acknowledge this, it should be easy to agree that each member of the family has a right to cultivate his own talents and to use, or display, his own taste.

Don't expect John to like your system of decoration for his room. Don't find fault with his choice of books, writing materials, or even ties. No. If his taste is atrocious, the family is to blame. If the family had been careful while John was still young enough, he would have better taste. It is only justice that the family should suffer for its own carelessness.

The collector of clippings, books, sketches, butterflies, has a right to those tastes. Often what is regarded by the family as "queerness" is the survival of a childish talent, or aptitude which a stupid system of education has almost killed. The wise relative should show interest in all family collections.

As the first family failing is a disregard for a member's rights to his own friends, so this second failing is a disregard for a member's right to his own tastes. Just as if you told a son, daughter, brother or sister: "You have no right to your own soul." To laugh at a child's or adult's "hobbies" is to laugh at the most frequent revelation of soul-strivings in the world.

If every member of a family would just resolve to respect every other member's friendships and tastes, there would be fewer complaints about another family failing—discourtesy.

This includes telling Mary that her dress looks "fierce," telling Aunt Jane, "How yellow you're getting," and also informing John, "You're as awkward as the deuce." Probably Mary must wear her dress however "fierce" it is, and Aunt Jane will be no happier for knowing she grows yellow, nor will John develop grace by being called awkward.

Discourtesy often goes deeper than these surface remarks, though. It is a far more gross discourtesy to hasten from the parlor every time Mary sits down to play, or to walk away from the rest of the company when Aunt Jane is in the middle of an oft-told tale. True, Aunt Jane should not be such a repeater but that gives you no excuse to let the general public observe your rudeness to her. Especially if she is growing old, and therefore garrulous at times.

Discourtesy in the family is usually the fault of the family. Children who were taught courtesy by example as well as precept for many years do not forget when they are older. But every discourteous adult can cure himself or herself.

Really one of the best cures for discourtesy is a really free hospitality. The kind of hospitality which will allow Mary to chat with her friend, John with his friend, father with his own cronies, and mother with hers. The family group which sees too much of one another and too little of friends grows queer and defeats one of the best missions of the home.

For the ideal home should be an asylum for the homeless or those in unhappy homes, and, equally, an asylum for its own. The best motto for such a one is that of the French Republic, "Liberte, egalite, fraternite."

Respect rights in others, and talents, and friends, and be happy and at home everywhere.

Good Bye Gray Hair!

Science has found the natural way to restore the color to gray hair! Without stains, or dyes, or bleaches of any kind! No matter how gray your hair may be, or no matter how long it has been gray, you can now restore it to its original color through an amazing discovery.

A Wonderful New Discovery

Tru-Tone, the new discovery, acts directly on the roots and so restores the original color to the hair It is a natural process known as pigmentation. Whether it has been red, blond, auburn or black, the original color will be restored this new way. Tru-Tone is not a dye, or a stain, or a tint. It does not act on the hair at all but on the tiny pigment cells that supply the hair with color. These cells can supply the hair with only one color--and that is the natural color. Tru-tone will restore your hair to the exact shade and lustre it had in youth.

Guaranteed Harmless

The most sensitive hair cannot be harmed by Tru-Tone. It is a fine, delicately-scented powder that you dissolve in water. Its constant use will not only keep the hair attractively and naturally colored, but will help to keep the scalp clear of dandruff and the hair thick and fluffy.

Guarantee Backed by Million Dollar Bank

This guarantee from a Million dollar bank protects every user of Tru-Tone.

Hope Chest Linens

With the coming of the spring days the June brides to be begin to take account of the stock which their hope chests already have, and make plans for what is still needed.

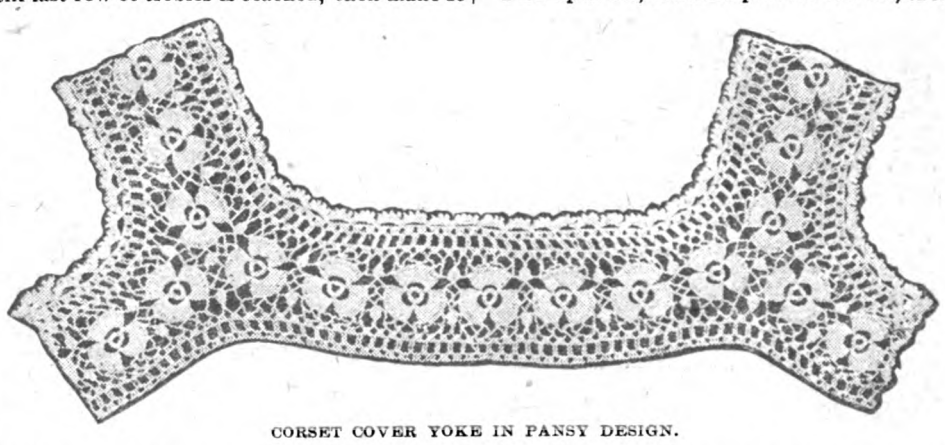
To do this successfully one must first consider what the future home is to be, whether a house, a flat or a first tiny home of only two or three rooms. Then only what is really needed will be purchased.

Any girl in need of advice as to just what she should have to begin housekeeping in a modest but comfortable way will find this list a most satisfactory one.

Six sheets,	Six wash-cloths,
Six pairs pillow slips,	Six huck towels,
Six hand towels,	Two guest towels,
Six dish towels,	Three pairs blankets,
Two dish cloths,	Two bedspreads,
Three glass towels,	Two puffs,
Three dust cloths,	One table-cloth,
Six bath towels,	Two breakfast cloths.

The table-cloth should be of linen even if not of the finest quality. This for guests with the addition of a dozen napkins, one-half of dinner and one-half of tea size, and the two smaller cloths will provide for the table linen for two, at the start.

To this may be added a hand-made luncheon set, table runners or perhaps a set of sanitas doilies, which are great labor savers.



Bureau covers, doilies, centerpieces and other extras which help to make a home pretty, can be made in spare moments or often come to the hope chest from friends.

Corset Cover Yoke in Pansy Design

Materials. No. 60 white or colored crochet cotton and suitable size steel hook.

Pansies

Ch 10, join in ring, 18 d c in ring, ch 10, fasten in 6th double, ch 10, fasten in 12th double, ch 10, fasten at base of 1st, ch 10, * 16 doubles under next 10 chs, turn, treble in every double (16 in all), turn, 15 tr c, ch 3, catch in last treble and sl st down to center ring, *, repeat from * to * for next petal, repeat for third petal till last row of trebles is reached, then make 16 trebtes, omitting 3 chs at end of row and do not sl st down side, * ch 9, fasten in top of ch 3 of next petal, ch 9, fasten in 4th treble, ch 9, fasten in 8th treble, ch 9, fasten in 12th treble, ch 9, fasten in 16th or last treble, *, repeat from * to * twice. Ch 9, catch at base of 1st 9 ch. This completes a pansy. Yoke requires 35 pansies for medium size, when making the loops of ch 9 join 3 loops to completed pansy in the following way: Ch 4, catch in center of ch 9 on completed pansy, ch 4, catch in pansy being made, repeat twice. Illustration will show position of each pansy and which loops to join.

CORSET COVER YOKE IN PANSY DESIGN.

Make the front over shoulders and back ones first, the under arms last. Join 10 in same way for front, 4 over each shoulder, 9 for back and 4 under each arm.

Border

Fasten thread in back in center of ch 9, ch 9, fasten in center of next ch 9, repeat around, making a cluster of 6 tr c between pansies to strengthen border, keeping trebles on hook until all are made and taking all off together.

2nd row—Sl st to center of ch 9, ch 3, 2 trebles under next ch 9, repeat around, joining to top of 1st ch 3.

Beading

3rd row—Sl st to ch 1, between trebles, ch 5, 1 d tr in 1st tr of cluster of trs, ch 3, 1 d tr in 1st ch between next two clusters of trs, 1 d tr in first tr of cluster following. Repeat around.

4th row—Sl st to 1st st of ch 3, ch 3, 2 tr in next 2 sts of ch, ch 1, c tr in next ch 3, repeat around.

5th row—Ch 7, sk 2 clusters of tr, catch in ch 1, repeat around.

Scallops

6th row—1 d c, 2 tr c, picot of ch 3, 2 tr c, 1 p, 2 tr c, 1 p, 2 tr c, 1 p, 2 tr c, 1 d c. This completes one scallop, repeat.

Border, neck and arms the same. Leave off scallops for bottom of yoke.

Use No. 60 crochet cotton, white or colored.

Mercerized Cotton Slip-On

Materials. For size 36 about 12 ounces of cotton perle No. 3 will be required, without sleeves 4 ounces less, 5 bone knitting needles and 1 bone crochet hook size 7 or 8.

This pretty garment features an entirely new idea, that of adding a crocheted border to a knitted body. The sweater is of stocking stitch, that is, 1 row plain, 1 purl, alternating. Work is commenced at the lower edge of the back. Cast 80 sts on the No. 5 needles.

1st row—Knit to end of row. Do not slip first stitch only as directed to do so.

2nd row—Purl all stitches.

Repeat these two rows until work measures about 15 inches or just below the bottom of the waist-line in the back. Then the crocheted border, as shown in our illustration, is added to complete the length of the sweater.

Divide work for shoulders and neck as follows: Knit 33 sts, bind off 14 sts for the neck, knit 33 sts. At this point the stitches on one side can be run onto a third needle or a safety pin, or retained on the original needle just as one prefers. Purl back. Knit and purl alternate rows, slipping first stitch now on each row on the armsize of the work.

When work measures three inches begin to increase one st on the center side of work on every other row. Continue until 12 sts have been added. Then work until opening for front is as long as desired.

Work the other shoulder to match, slip all stitches (90 in all) onto one needle and continue until work equals length of the back, folding it over at the neck line.

Sleeves

Pick up 60 sts, knit and purl for 18 rows, then commence decreasing to shape the sleeve, as follows:

19th row—K 1, k 2 tog, k to within 3 sts of end of row, then k 2 tog, k 1.

Decrease in this way in every 5th row until sleeves are right length and width. Bind off loosely.

Seam both sides of garment from the bottoms to edge of sleeves, then around bottom work a row of slip stitches loosely to even the work.

To slip stitch insert the hook into edge of knitting and draw thread through stitch and loop on hook at the same time.

Crochet Border for Lower Edge

As many rows of the open pattern, here illustrated, are used for a border as one desires, and the sleeves are edged in the sme way.

1st round—After slip stitching, beginning at an under-arm seam, * ch 4, sk 3 sts, 1 s c, repeat from * all around, ending with 1 s c.

2nd round—7 s c under each ch 4.

3rd round—Sl st to center of first loop, ch 5, 1 sl st in 5th s c of next loop.

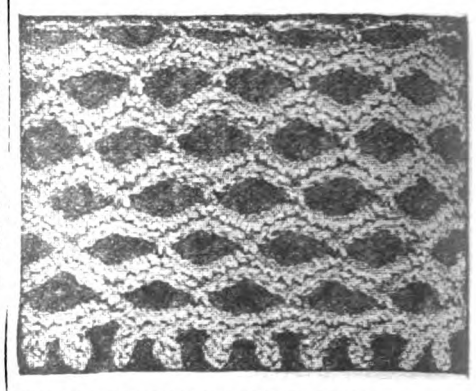
4th round.—Same as 2nd row.

Repeat 3rd and 4th rounds as many times as one desires, then to finish work around same as the 3rd and follow with a picot edge made as follows: 3 s c, 1 p, 3 s c, 1 p, 3 s c under each ch. Break thread and fasten off by running through back stitches.

The border around sleeves is worked in the same way, but narrower, 12 rounds being a good depth.

Edging Around Neck

Work one row of slip stitches all around the opening of the neck to give evenness and firmness to the work, commencing at point in front.



1st round—1 s c in 1st st, * ch 4, sk 3 sl sts, 1 s c into 4th st, repeat from * all around.

2nd round—* 1 s c into 1st loop of ch 4, ch 3, sl st into top of s c to form picot, 1 s c, 1 p, 1 s c, making 2 picots and 3 singles in loop, repeat from * all around and join.

Take two threads and crochet a chain about a yard in length, thread it through the holes formed by hooks around the neck and finish the ends with tassels or balls. This cord tied in front makes a very pretty finish.

Crocheted Girdle for Summer Wear

This pretty girdle is formed of interlocked rings made as follows of No. 3 mercerized pearle crochet cotton. Ch 7, join in ring, ch 1, 14 d c in ring, join and leave thread long enough to fasten. Ch 7, run through finished ring and join, ch 1, 14 d c in ring, join and leave thread. All rings may be of the same color or several shades may be combined.

Filet Initial D

1st row.—17 sps, ch 5, turn.

2nd row.—2 sps, 3 blks, 3 sps, 4 blks, 5 sps, ch 5, turn.

3rd row.—4 sps, 1 blk, 4 sps, 3 blks, 3 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

4th row.—2 sps, 3 blks, 2 sps, 2 blks, 4 sps, 1 blk, 3 sps, ch 5, turn.

5th row.—2 sps, 1 blk, 4 sps, 2 blks, 8 sps, ch 5, turn.

6th row.—9 sps, 2 blks, 3 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

7th row.—1 sp, 2 blks, 3 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, 3 blks, 5 sps, ch 5, turn.

8th row.—4 sps, 1 blk, 5 sps, 2 blks, 2 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

9th row.—1 sp, 2 blks, 2 sps, 2 blks, 5 sps, 1 blk, 4 sps, ch 5, turn.

10th row.—4 sps, 1 blk, 6 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps, ch 5, turn.

11th row.—3 sps, 2 blks, 6 sps, 1 blk, 5 sps, ch 5, turn.

12th row.—6 sps, 6 blks, 2 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps, ch 5, turn.

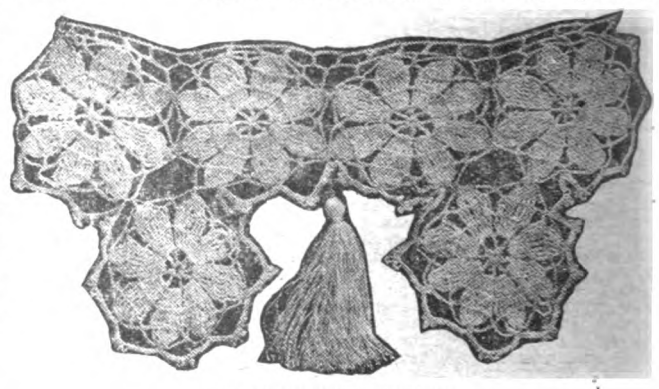
13th row.—17 sps.

Point Wheel Edging

This simple but effective pattern is specially good for scarf ends.

Wheels of No. 30 cotton will result in an edge about three inches wide.

Begin each wheel in the center with a ch 4, join in ring, ch 8.

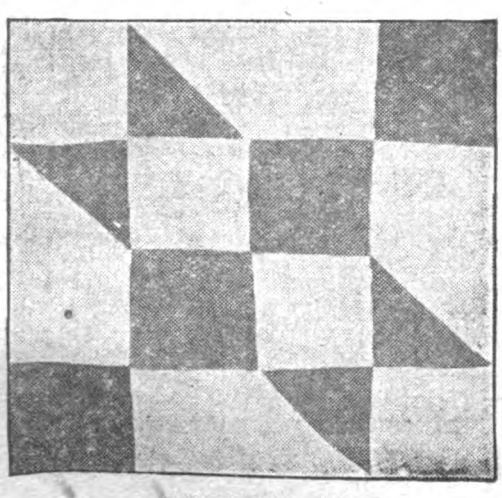


1st round—1 d c in ring, ch 3, 1 d c in ring, repeat 5 times more, ch 3, join to 1st ch 5, ch 4.

2nd round—5 tr c in 1st sp, ch 1, 6 tr c in next sp, ch 1, repeat around, ch 4.

3rd round—1 tr c on 1st 2 tr c on 2nd tr, repeat, ch 3. Repeat trs on each spoke, ch 3, join, ch 4.

4th round—1 tr on each tr retaining last loop of each on the hook and working these off together, ch 5, 1 s c under ch 3, ch 5, repeat around, ending with ch 5, 1 s c in center of 1st spoke.



Make each wheel in this way, joining a row as shown when making by two and two spokes, then add third wheel. To the top add a row of spaces made of ch 5, 1 s c over the spokes and chs of 5, 1 d c between the wheels. Finish with 2nd row of ch 5, 1 d c under a ch, ch 5, 1 d c, repeat.

To the lower or point edge join thread to center of a spoke, ch 15, 1 s c on next spoke, continue around third wheel, along two wheels around next third wheel, and so on. Finish with a row of 10 s c, ch 3, 1 s c, ch 3, 1 s c, ch 3, 10 s c under each ch. Two-inch tassels between the points are a great addition.

Tatted Hand Bag

OUR illustration of the single medallion which makes up the main part of this tatted bag shows the pattern quite clearly.

Work is begun in the center by making 4 rings each of 1 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, close as closely together as possible (as shown in Fig. 1).

The edge of each medallion is the clover-leaf design connected by chains which are joined to the center group of 4 rings as shown. Clover leaf rings are each of 3 d s, 6 p with 1 d s between, 3 d s, close. Join 1st 2 picots of center ring to last 2 ps of 1st ring and join 1st 2 ps of 3rd ring to last 2 ps of center ring, ch 3 d s, 5 p with 1 d s between, 1 clover leaf, joining 2nd and 3rd ps to 5th and 4th ps of last ring of 1st clover leaf.

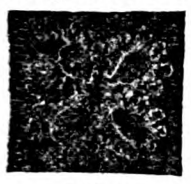

FIG. 1.

Complete leaf as before. Ch 3 d s, join to 1st p of last ch, 5 p with 1 d s between 3 d s. In this 2nd ch join 3rd free p to center p of one of the group of 4 rings in the center.

Continue repeating clover leaves and chains alternately, joining the leaves as directed and the center picot of every other ch to the center until one has completed 8 clovers as shown in the medallion.

In making the second medallion join the center picots of the first two clovers to corresponding ps of last two clovers in the first medallion. Repeat work until one has two strips of six medallions each.

These should now be basted to either a piece of cloth or paper opposite each other about half the width of the medallion apart. This space is filled by crossing with chains as shown.

To do this make a 5 p ring, close, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 ring same as last, joining center p to center picot of clover on top medallion on one strip, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 ring, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 ring, join to top side clover of second medallion, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 ring, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 ring, join to next medallion.

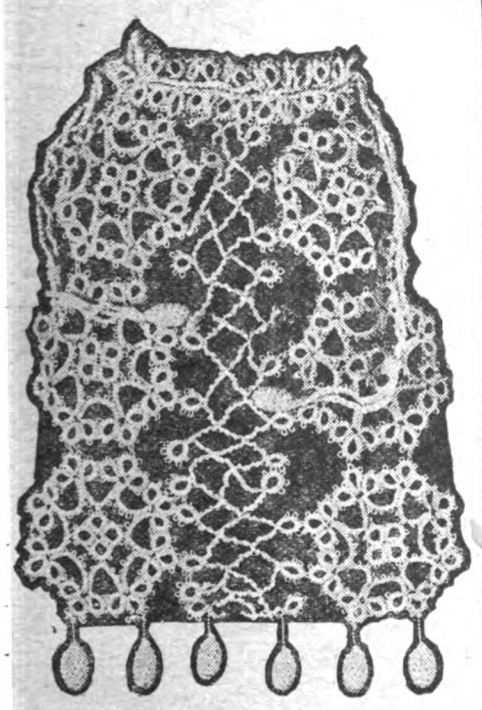

FIG. 2.

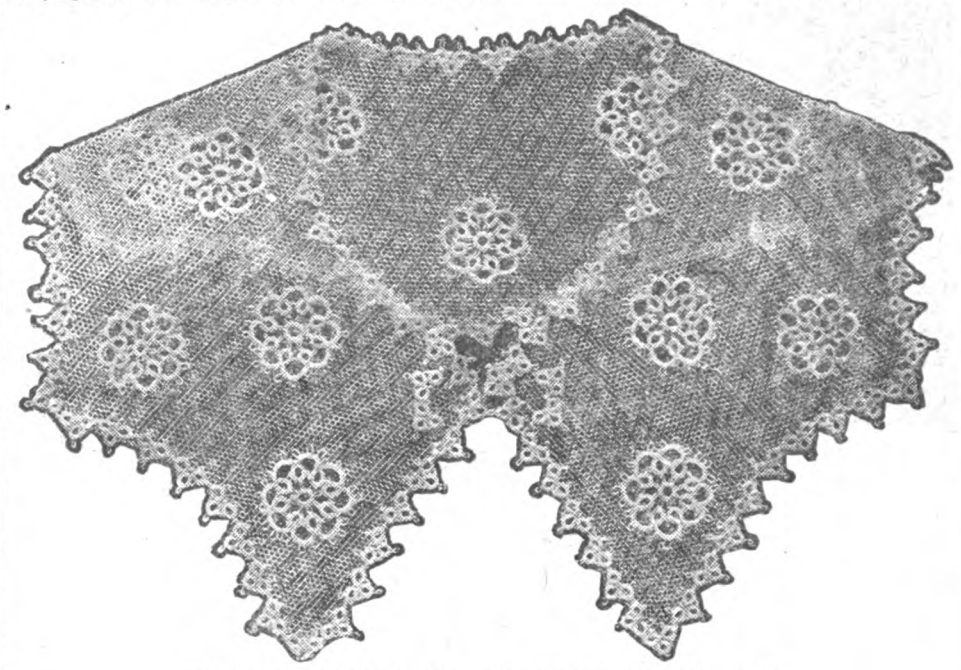
Repeat, working in this way until all medallions on one side have been joined. After making ring which is joined to last medallion finish with ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 ring.

Now straighten out the chains and baste rings in place. The first ring made should turn in the opposite direction to the medallions to which the second ring was joined, and be basted down just above the top medallion on the second strip.

Now begin again with a ring, ch 5, join to 1st p of 1st ch, now ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, ring joined to top medallion of second strip. Now ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, join to 2nd p of 2nd ch, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 ring. Ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, join to 2nd p of 3rd ch, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 ring join to top clover of second medallion.

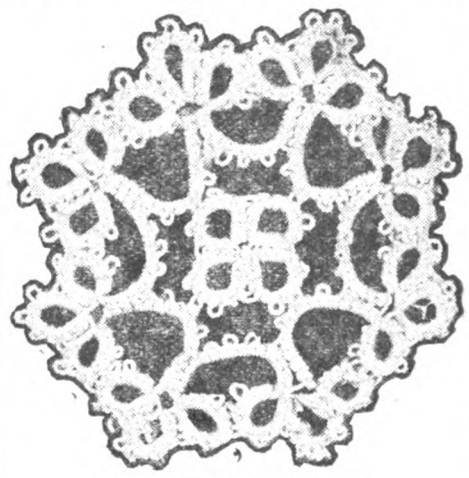
Repeat, making a ch and a free ring, a ch and a ring joined to top clover of each succeeding medallion to end; then finish with a ch and ring as before.



TATTED HAND BAG.

Arrange and baste down these rings and chains, starting with the first ring over the medallion which one joined to first.

Again start with a ring, joining 1 p to last p of the ring just placed above medallion, complete ring, thus making two about the first medallion.



Ch 5, 1 p joined to 2nd p of 1st ch, ch 5, 1 p, ch 3, 1 p joined to 1st p of 2nd ch, ch 5, 1 ring joined to 2nd clover of top medallion on 2nd strip.

TATTED TRIMMED NET COLLAR, BY ORA ARMSTRONG HILL.

Now, ch 5, 1 p joined to 3rd ch, ch 5, first ring joined to free ring between 1st and 2nd medallion in 1st strip.

Now, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, join to 1st p of 4th ch, ch 5, 1 ring joined to 2nd clover of 2nd medallion.

MEDALLION USED IN BAG.

Next, chains and ring joined to free ring, then chains and ring joined to medallion, to end of strip.

Beginning again at top make ring and join below the first ring made, thus making two rings above 2nd strip of medallions, ch 5, join to p of 1st ch crossed, ch 5, join to second ch, ch 5 joined to 3rd ch, 1 ring join to 2nd clover of top medallion of 1st strip, 4 chs of 5, 1 ring, join to free ring on opposite side between 1st and 2nd medallions.

Repeat, when this is completed, two clovers of each medallion will be joined and there will be two free rings joined together, between each medallion.

When this part of the work is complete fold in half and join the side clovers of each medallion.

Finish the top with one row of tatting worked as shown in Fig. 2. 1 ring, 7 p with 1 d s between one-third inch space, 1 ring in opposite direction. Space, 1 ring joining first 2 picots to last two of first ring.

Make 4th ring and join to 2nd and repeat.

Knitted Silk Stockings

New hand-knitted silk stockings have made their appearance to take the place of the woolen ones which have been so popular the past few winters.

Materials. 6 balls sweater silk, 1 ball mercerized cotton of the same shade, 2 pairs No. 16 or 18 steel needles.

With cotton cast on 121 stitches on one needle. Knit and purl alternate rows for one inch. Purl 2 rows. Divide the stitches on three needles, 41 on first and 40 on each of the other two, purl first st in every alternate round to form a seam.

After knitting one inch plain, fold over the top piece and join by knitting the cast-on sts with those on needles to make a hem.

Break off the cotton, join silk and knit plain for 10 inches, after which begin decreasing to shape the leg as follows: Seam st, k 1, k 2 tog, k to within 3 sts of end of round, k 2 tog, k 1. Knit 6 rounds without decreasing.

7th round—Decrease in this round as before, then k 5 rounds without decreasing and continue working in this way with 1 round less each time between the decreasings, until sts are reduced to 112.

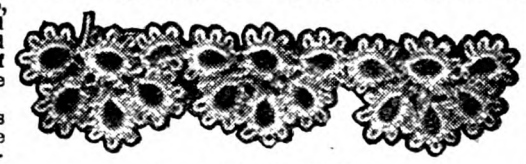
Then decrease in every other round till they are reduced to 87, after which knit plain for 5 inches.

Divide for heel, placing 20 sts on each side of the seam, and leaving 46 sts for the instep.

For the heel, sl 1, k 1, purl 2, k 16, purl 1, k 16, purl 2, k 2. Purl back. Knit these 2 rows 18 times in all.

Then work as before to seam sts, k 2, k 2 tog, k 1, turn. Purl 7, purl 2 tog, purl 1, turn. Continue in this way, knitting and purling an extra st in every row until all the sts are worked off.

Pick up from side of heel 18 sts, k across instep needle and pick up 18 sts from other side of heel.



Knit one round plain, then decrease to shape gusset of foot as follows: On first needle knit to within 3 sts of end, k 2 tog, k 1, k across instep needle. On third needle k 1, k 2 tog, k to end.

Knit a round without decreasing, and repeat these 2 rounds until the sts on the two back needles are reduced to 46 (92 in all).

Work plain until the foot measures seven and a half or eight inches, then decrease for the toe as follows: Decrease at the end of first needle as before; on instep needle k 1, k 2 tog, k to within 3 sts of the end, k 2 tog, k 1; decrease at beginning of third needle as before, k 2 rounds without decreasing. Repeat these 3 rounds until the sts are reduced to 36. Bind off.

Half-Wheel Tatted Edge

1 ring, 2 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, close. As close to the first ring as possible make a second ring, close. Make third ring joining 1st p to last p of second ring. Join second p to next p, then make 5 free picots and close. Join to p of first ring. Repeat, making 3 more rings, after each joining to successive picots of first ring.

HALF-WHEEL EDGING.

Leave one-half inch of thread and make another first and second rings, joining the 4th p of the second ring to the center p of the last ring. Repeat for length desired.

Tatted Trimmed Net Collar

The simplest and best way to make this an attractive collar is first to cut a paper pattern the desired shape but a little larger than one wishes the finished collar, baste the net to this and after one has finished the tatted wheels and clover-leaf edging baste this in place, as shown, and apply to the net with a fine buttonhole stitch after which the neck may be cut away under the wheels as one prefers.

The clover-leaf edge is made with a single thread of three rings each of 5 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 5 d s, close.

Tatted Wheel Motifs

The center ring of this motif is made with 8 picots, 2 d s between each, close, tie and cut thread. With shuttle make one small ring of 5 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, join to p of center ring, 3 d s, 1 p, 5 d s, close. With 2 threads make ch of 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 8 d s, 1 small ring joining to center ring, 1 3 p, ch, repeat.

ORA ARMSTRONG HILL.

Tatted Curtain Pull Backs

Use heavy cotton, either No. 10 or 15, for these unless the curtains are very fine and sheer on which they will be used.

Make a large 5 p ring as per directions above, close, carry thread across back to center p, join as closely as possible. Make another ring. Repeat for length of pull backs.

Finish end with a wheel made like center of rosette, omitting the last round.

Of the coarse cotton the center should slip over a hook easily.

had no one to love you'—when you refused to leave me, and took up your station by my side to die with me, as we both believed, I felt as if something of the spirit of my lost love was shining through you. Then your tenderness toward, and your care of me—your heroic self-denial and efforts to save my life while we were helplessly afloat on the mighty ocean—your sweet voice singing those hymns of faith and cheer, completed the conquest of my hardened nature. I can never make you understand how disappointed I was, on arriving in New York, to find you gone. I meant to tell you something of myself, and learn your own destination, so that I might see you once in a while.

"But I never forgot you; and when I visited my nephew in the West, and met only coldness and neglect, simply because of my misfortunes, I could not help contrasting it with your kind attention to an entire stranger.

"I left those heartless people and came to my niece, and met with the same reception, when before they had always fawned at my feet, flattered and humored me as if I had been something more than common clay.

"I felt forsaken; no one loved me, no one wanted me; I was a burden and incumbrance. But just then you appeared to me, and your heavenly kindness made my poor old heart glow again. Still, I was so embittered by finding my only brother's children so heartless and selfish, that I was not quite sure of you. It made me mistrust everybody, and I feared you might grow to be like them. But for that I should not have remained a day beneath Ellen Richards' roof; I should have gone my own way again as soon as I became rested and recruited. My dear, I began to love you for my lost Star's sake; now I love you for your own. There, you have all my story now, and you must go to rest, for tomorrow will be your birthday, and we must celebrate a little in honor of it," Mr. Rosevelt concluded, patting her softly on the shoulder.

Star lifted a flushed and tearful face to his.

"Uncle Jacob!" she cried, tenderly; "it seems as if you are really that to me now; and I am so glad that you have told you how you loved my grandmother, and I shall try more than ever after this to make your life as bright as possible. I do not see how any one could ever have treated you unkindly or disrespectfully."

Uncle Jacob smiled fondly at her.

"I know there is one, at least, who treats me friendly for my own sake, and who would share all her laurels with me. My child, I was very proud of you tonight."

"And I of you," Star added, quickly. "I never saw you look so nice—so like an aristocratic old gentleman."

He laughed, such a bright, hearty laugh that she wondered to see him so pleased over her little compliment.

"Now, good night," he said, rising; "I want you to be as fresh as possible tomorrow."

He led her to the door of her room, and then, with a softly breathed "God bless you!" sought his own.

But she did not go directly to bed, as he bade her; his story had strangely stirred her heart, and she could not rest until she had decided some questions that were troubling her.

She opened a drawer of her dressing-case, and taking that worn portfolio to which we have before referred from it, unlocked it, and drew forth a sealed package.

"Papa told me to wait until I was eighteen before I opened and read it," she said, musingly; "but a few hours can make no difference, and I feel now as if I must know if he was her son, and why he never would tell me anything about his family."

With reverent fingers she broke the seals, a sob rising to her lips as she thought whose hand had fastened them there, and how tenderly it used to stroke her hair and call her "My bright little Star."

The package contained several papers, and it took her more than an hour to examine them; but when she had read them through, there was a look of wonder in her large blue eyes and an almost blank expression on her white face.

HOWDY, Girls! My, aren't you the good-looking crowd of girls. Don't begin powdering your noses, you are quite all right as you are. I had heaps of things to tell you, scoldings, good advice, good resolutions, etc., but there are so many questions to be answered that the scoldings, anyway, will have to wait until the next time. H-m-m, springtime. I might have known there would be more questions than usual. Here we are:

JOHN, Oregon.—Girls are peculiar things, aren't they, John? One never knows what they are going to do any more than they know themselves, but we like them. You may be to blame for your sweetheart's "failing" love. You are either too attentive or else not attentive enough. Which is it? If the latter double your attentions and continue to be attentive after marriage if you want to keep her love in a strong, healthy condition, and not in need of pink pills. If the former, neglect her a little for some other girl, one she doesn't like, preferably. As I have already said, one never knows what a girl will do—she may throw you down flat or she may realize that she cares a lot for you. Anyway, you are apt to lose her as matters are now so you might as well take a chance and win or lose all.

"He either fears his fate too much,
Or his desserts are small,
That dares not put it to the touch
To gain or lose it all."

TROUBLED, Ark.—Be friendly with all girls but don't get so friendly with one that you give up all others, even if she is jealous and wants you to. Such crushes are bad for all concerned. You can be more friendly with her than any of the others, if you wish, but have it understood that you are to keep your own friends. The girl I like best (only we aren't "girls" any more) never liked my friends and I never liked hers yet we think as much of each other as we did years ago and have our own friends regardless of each other. We think it rather a joke because we don't like each other's friends, and often laugh over it. Isn't this a better way than being jealous?

VEXED, Iowa.—It is very true that if you give up the man your parents dislike you can never love another as you love him—but it's mighty comforting to know you can love another so much more that you'll forget all about the first one. If you are sure of each other you can afford to wait until you gain the consent of your parents, or, at least, a while longer. He should understand how uncomfortable the situation is for you and be willing to do his part toward making it better.

KENTUCKY BLUE BELL.—Your letter is contradictory, to say the least. If you like him "just as a friend" there should be no occasion for questioning the right or wrong of letting him put his arms around you and kissing you. "Just friends" don't do that. No, indeed, it doesn't prove that he loves you and "would give his life for you" when he does that. It merely proves that you are an easy little girl to allow it, and being an easy little girl is the first step toward being an uneasy little girl. Trust him if you want to—but at arm's length. If he really cares for you he will realize that you are young and should be protected and he will join with your mother in keeping you from harm. I'm not saying that he doesn't love you but if he wants to marry you he will ask your parents' consent and then wait until you are of a marriageable age—not before three years. Remember your promise to rely on my advice. Boys are getting nicer all the time (if only I were a young girl again!) and by the end of three years you may meet a wonderful fellow and think how perfectly tragic it would be if you were married and had a baby—twins, maybe—by that time!

C. S., Illinois.—If at the end of two years you still care for each other and your parents are willing, it seems that it would be all right to get married, but think it over first. Marrying a minister is a serious thing, for a minister's wife has more to do toward making or marring his life than has the wife of the average business man to do with her husband's success or failure. If I were going to marry a minister I'd study and fit myself to be his wife in all that it would mean, and if possible I'd take a special course at some good Bible school—but there isn't a chance of anything like that happening to me. I'm very frivolous in spite of the scoldings I hand out to you girls and it would keep a minister so busy saving my soul that he wouldn't have the time to look after the spiritual and moral welfare of his flock and they'd go plumb to the bowwows.

BOBBIE, Texas.—You know very well, Bobby-Texas, that you shouldn't go car-riding with a boy after twelve at night, and if you do it again I'll go right down to Texas and spank both of you. Only sixteen years old! For that matter, after twelve at night isn't a respectable time to go for a ride even if you were thirty years old.

DELSIE, Pa.—Maybe when you are older and larger and better educated you might become a good nurse. Nobody knows. When you acquire above mentioned qualities, write me again, telling me more about yourself, and I'll do my best to help you.

GLADYS, Okla.—The very fact that your mother has been married three times proves that she is a better judge of men than you are and it would be better to obey her. (2) See answer to Kentucky Blue Bell, about kissing. (3) Whether one can love more than once has always been a debated question and I believe the ayes have it, at least, that's how it appears in everyday life. It is different in books.

BROWN EYES, Ala.—You are doubtless happier with a good position than you would be married to a jealous old man or a poor young one. If you marry the wealthy, older man you will have to give up all your liberty and pleasures, and if you marry the other one you'll have to work harder than you do now. Not very pleasant prospects. Of course if you cared a lot for him you wouldn't mind that but your letter doesn't indicate that you do care. Do you know what I think would be the very best thing for you to do? You say you are a poor girl and have had a hard time all your life and because of this you haven't had the opportunity for an education. Your letter shows this, but I'm not going to scold because it wasn't your fault—but I do think you should spend your evenings studying instead of going to dances and to the movies. Not every evening, perhaps, for if the movies or a dance mean a good time to you then you deserve to have it. But it is surprising how our ideas of a good time change as we grow older. You won't always want to dance and you'll grow tired of the movies, but if your mind is trained to appreciate good literature and other worthwhile things, you need never be lonely.

CITY GIRL, N. Y.—No, you are not selfish. If you were you'd marry him and then fuss and nag him to such an extent that he'd give up his beloved Western ranch to live in an Eastern city with you. It is generous of him to be willing to do that but do you want him to do it? He'd probably dislike city life, and, another thing, is he as well fitted to earn his living, and yours, in the city as he is on a ranch? That's quite important. I think you underrate your cababilities. We never know what we can do until we have to or want to and you appear to care enough for him to want to be with him, even on a lonely ranch. Can't you visit his home, properly chaperoned, of course, and get a line on things? Then you could judge for yourself as to whether or not you would be equal to all that would be expected of you. He would do his best to make everything as easy as he could if he understands how you feel about the work.

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

Leaky Float

THE working principle of the vacuum system for supplying gasolene to the carburetor has been previously explained. In brief, the tank consists of two chambers between which is a partition containing a valve. The suction of the motor creates a vacuum in the upper chamber. This vacuum draws gasolene from the storage gasolene tank usually in the rear of the car, also closes the valve between the two chambers of the vacuum tank. As the gasolene flows into the upper chamber of the tank it causes a float to rise until it reaches a certain point at which it closes a valve shutting off the suction from the motor. The description has now gone far enough to answer the purpose intended. The float in the vacuum tank is of metal construction and therefore there is a possibility of leaks. Should the float for some reason develop a small hole, gasolene would gradually enter this opening until the quantity became sufficient to weight the float until it refused to rise. Now we would have a condition that sometimes occurs and which is difficult to locate unless of course similar difficulty has been experienced before. The motor loads, chokes and often refuses to operate. The reason is that the suction valve in the vacuum tank is not being closed and for this reason raw gasolene is being taken directly into the intake manifold above the carburetor. The accompanying illustration shows a good method for determining whether the suction valve is operating properly. Remove the pipe line leading from the top of the vacuum tank to the intake manifold. Procure two pieces of glass pipe and connect the two with rubber tubing. Place rubber washers at the ends of the glass tubing and press one tubing against the connection in the manifold and the other tubing against the connection in the tank. When the motor is started it can be readily determined if the suction valve is working properly as the gasolene will be seen passing through the glass tubings if the valve does not shut off the suction.

To test for a leak in the float, dip it into a pan of hot water. If bubbles rise, note the spot and mark it. Enlarge the hole a trifle at the point of leak, also punch another small hole on the opposite side of float. This allows the gasolene to be drained from inside of float after which solder the two holes and again test for leaks by dipping into hot water. Use only enough solder to effect a repair as piles of solder cause the float to become too heavy.

Slipping the Clutch

About July of each year is the time that many owners complain that the clutch on their car does not hold. Numerous complaints are heard about faulty clutch construction and the like but if each individual case could be thoroughly investigated the majority would be found the fault of the driver. There are many ways in which an owner will subject his clutch to considerable abuse. How many times have you noticed an owner get into his car, shift into gear, open the throttle until the motor roars and then let in the clutch? It is a common occurrence. Under such circumstances the clutch must do considerable slipping until it gradually takes hold of the load. The proper manner of starting is to open the throttle just a trifle or, in other words, to just make certain of sufficient motor power to prevent stalling while taking up the load when the car is standing. Then again there is the nervous driver who continually has his foot on the clutch pedal. It is excellent practice to have the foot ready to depress the clutch pedal but it is poor policy to ride the pedal. By this I mean keeping a little pressure on the pedal at all times. This condition prevents full tension on the clutch plates and has a tendency to cause them to slip. Riding the clutch pedal is not only done by nervous drivers but by many who have formed a habit of it. Again there is the type of driver who believes his car should make every hill on high. He stubbornly refuses to shift gears and as the motor commences to lose power or knock he slips the clutch to allow the motor to pick up. The abuse suffered by the clutch under such conditions is almost beyond words to describe and sooner or later is developed a clutch that will not hold under any condition and each year we hear about faulty clutch construction, etc.

Helpful Pointers

Water for Battery

Do not forget that a storage battery requires distilled water. The water evaporates but the acid does not. Add water but not acid. Keep the plates covered. Water that has been properly distilled is usually free at any battery station or repair shop. It is yours for the asking so don't ruin the battery by neglect to replenish the water.

Stubborn Screws

A screw or bolt that has rusted in place is difficult to remove, often shearing off before it will give to the pressure of the wrench or screwdriver. Many times an effective way to loosen them is to make a mould (putty will do) in the shape of a retaining cup around the screw or bolt to be moved. Pour kerosene into the cup and allow it to soak around the threads for about 12 hours.

Spindle Bolts

A spindle bolt that screws into the lower lip of the front axle yoke is sometimes difficult to start regardless of the size of wrench used. One mechanic who appears to have excellent success in removing steering spindle bolts proceeds as follows: Remove the nut from end of bolt and then strike head of bolt several heavy blows with large hammer. Strike end of bolt several heavy blows with lead hammer (lead hammer being used here to prevent damage to threads). Apply wrench to head of bolt and if bolt does not give to pressure strike wrench on end a sharp blow with hammer.

Oil Necessary

Transmissions and rear axles require oil. These units are often forgotten until something happens. If you haven't given these assemblies oil recently, better look at them now. Many cars have growling transmissions and rear axles, which condition could be corrected by pouring into the cases a suitable quantity of oil.

Cutting Valve Seats

Unless the greatest care is exercised in the recutting of valve seats the cutter is apt to leave chatter marks that are difficult to remove. File the teeth of the cutter with hard oil and the danger of making chatter marks is reduced to the minimum.

Removing Chatter Marks

Should the cutter make chatter marks in the valve seat it is almost an impossibility to remove them by continued cutting. A mechanic of my acquaintance removed the marks by using a discarded valve having the same angle as the seat. He used coarse grinding compound and ground the old valve into the seat until the chatter marks disappeared. He then used the cutter on the seat and ground in the new valve.

Answers to Correspondents

KNOCK IN GENERATOR.—The Wagner generator in my 1919 Grant Six R X model car has a very hard knock when car is driven over twenty miles an hour, but when driven at less speed it does not knock. Do you think there is too much play in magneto shaft? If so how am I to stop it?

MRS. E. H. N., Lime City, O.

A.—I would suggest that the knock in the generator is caused by a worn bearing. A repairman or anyone familiar with generators should easily determine whether a new bearing is needed.

PUDDLING SCORED CYLINDER.—One cylinder of my 1917 Dodge car has four scores, two each on opposite sides of the cylinder wall, about one inch apart, caused by a wrist pin getting loose; these cuts are about a quarter of an inch wide and about a thirty-second of an inch deep. Can I have these small places filled by welding without ruining the walls?

L. R. C., Coffeyville, Kansas.

A.—I am informed that there are concerns especially in the larger cities that have facilities for puddling deep scores in cylinders after which it is necessary to regrind the cylinder a trifle over size and fit new pistons. To obtain smooth operation it would be necessary to have all cylinders reground to the same size.

CRACKED WATER JACKET.—The water jacket of the engine of my 1917 model Overland car is slightly cracked in four places, due to water freezing. Can you tell me of a good solution to put in to stop the leaks without having the engine welded? There is also a slight crack in the valve case and water leaks into crank case. Would it be safe to use solution for this crack?

W. T. B., Eldred, Ill.

A.—I have known of cases where cracked water jackets that could not be welded have been repaired by rusting. In one instance I have in mind, the cylinders were removed, pistons taken out and the water openings plugged. The cylinders were turned over so that they rested on the head. One of the plugs was removed and the water jackets filled with a strong solution of sal-ammoniac. The opening was replugged and the cylinders allowed to stand in that condition for about 24 hours. On the other hand, if the crack is too large for the solution to be effective I am told that there is a preparation sold under the trade name of "Smooth On" which when applied directly to the crack will quickly harden when exposed to the air. It is suggested that sal-ammoniac solution be used in connection with the preparation. Kindly bear in mind that I have not personally tried out this suggestion and am only stating the advice given me by others.

MINERALIZED WATER ROUTS CHICKEN LICE

Tablets Dropped into Drinking Founts Banish Vermin, Make Fowls Grow Faster and Increase Egg Yield.

Any poultry raiser can easily rid his flock of lice and mites, makes chickens grow faster and increase their egg yield by simply adding minerals to the fowls' drinking water. This does away with all bother, such as dusting, greasing, dipping and spraying. The necessary minerals can now be obtained in convenient tablets, known as Paratabs. Soon after the fowls drink the mineralized water, all lice and mites leave them. The tablets also act as a tonic conditioner. The health of the fowls quickly improves, they grow faster and the egg yield frequently is doubled. Little chicks that drink freely of the water never will be bothered by mites or lice.

The method is especially recommended for raisers of purebred stock, as there is no risk of soiling the plumage. The tablets are warranted to impart no flavor or odor to the eggs and meat. This remarkable conditioner, egg tonic and lice remedy costs only a trifle and is sold under an absolute guarantee. The tablets are scientifically prepared, perfectly safe, and dissolve readily in water.

Any reader of this paper may try them without risk. The laboratories producing Paratabs are so confident of good results that to introduce them to every poultry raiser they offer two big $1 packages for only $1. Send no money, just your name and address—a card will do— to the Paratab Laboratories, Dept. 869, 1100 Coca Cola Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., and the two $1 packages, enough for 100 gallons of water, will be mailed. Pay the postman $1 and postage on delivery, and if you are not delighted with results in 10 days—if your chickens are not healthier, laying more eggs and entirely free from lice and mites—your money will be promptly refunded. Don't hesitate to accept this trial offer as you are fully protected by

Keep the Young Stock Growing

I HAVE found that chicks that are grown rapidly return the most money. We would not force the pullets to lay before they secure their growth by the use of stimulants, condiments and emmenagogues, but pullets that are grown quickly on a good healthy diet will mature their bodies before ripening their egg organs.

Pullets that are grown in the open air consume a larger amount of food and put it to a good use. The body will reach full development before she drops an egg. The ovary (the egg-producing organ) is largely dependent on heat for its growth, and sometimes by keeping chicks long in heated brooders, close housing and feeding a stimulating, heat-producing ration, we can cause them to lay before the body has matured. Such pullets will never make good layers for any length of time, and their eggs are usually under size. It is probably because of having grown such pullets that writers have warned us not to force birds intended for breeders or layers.

When pullets are grown right—given room, airy coops at night, free range or large yard, and fed a wholesome ration, there is no danger of their developing too fast.

When chicks are eight weeks old, they should be separated from their mothers, and the families divided; the young pullets being relegated to colony coops in an orchard or partly-shaded meadow, where they will have extensive free range; the cockerels being placed in the semi-confinement of wards, as their ultimate fate is the frying-pan, which necessitates plump bodies, while free range would only develop frame and muscle.

Our colony houses are six feet long, three feet wide, thirty-six inches high in front, and twenty-four inches at the back. They are made of light scantling, the ends, back and roof being covered with roofing paper; and the front, to within eight inches of the ground, with unbleached muslin, which insures perfect ventilation and prevents rain beating in upon the birds when they are upon the roosts, which are fixed a foot from the bottom and nine inches from the back of the coop. Two holes are made, nine inches apart, in the middle of each end of the coop, and a heavy rope knotted through them, to form handles.

The coops having no flooring, and the whole construction being light, they are easily removed to fresh ground every week and so kept clean with little trouble—an important item when there is a large quantity being used. Having a large orchard, we placed the coops in rows thirty feet apart, as two sides of the orchard adjoin woodland, through which a never-failing spring stream runs, so the birds have a splendid range.

Twenty birds are placed in each coop. The first week a portable yard, five feet long, is placed in front of each coop, so that the young chicks cannot wander off and get lost, as they surely would in strange quarters. During that time a self-feeding hopper and a drinking fountain are placed inside of the coop. When the yard is removed, the individual vessels are dispensed with, large drinking tubs and food hoppers being stationed midway between every four coops, to reduce time and labor in caring for the birds.

The large hoppers are nothing more than boxes, five feet long, two feet wide and six inches deep, over which is placed an A-shaped cover, made of slats one inch apart, to prevent the birds getting into the box and scratching the grain into the ground, where it will be wasted. For water, five-gallon kegs are used, with an automatic escape, which keeps a small pan continually full. Both feed and water are placed under a rough shelter to protect them from sun and rain. Using such large receptacles, it is only necessary to fill them every other day.

Feed consists of a dry mash, composed of ten pounds of wheat bran, ten pounds of ground oats, one pound of white middlings, one pound of old process oil meal, and ten pounds of beef scraps well mixed. In addition to that, they receive at night a feed of wheat and cracked corn, two parts of the former to one of the latter. About half a pint is scattered in front of each coop about 4 P. M.

Grit is supplied in large quantities. Being near a stone crusher, we buy the screenings by the cartload and dump it in heaps on the outskirts of the orchard, where it does not show but is quite accessible to the chicks.

On these rations, without any variation, the pullets are kept until September, when they are transferred to their winter quarters.

Pullets which have to be grown in confinement should have a well-littered coop of good size, and having large openings. That is, the greater portion of one side should be wire. The pullets should not be crowded, nor should they be grown in large flocks. They should be fed practically the same as those on free range. They should have the dry mash before mentioned, grit, charcoal and shells, and be fed grain and green food. Where the green food is lettuce, lawn clippings or garden refuse, they should have two grain feeds a day, and this should be scattered in litter, not too deep. Where sprouted oats are used for greens, one feed a day of hard grain is sufficient.

Cockerels and old hens should not be allowed with growing pullets. Where cockerels are allowed to run with pullets neither will mature to full size. Too often we see cockerels and pullets allowed free range on the farm and all allowed to mix together. Good stock cannot be grown in this manner, and the future egg yield of the flock will not be as large as it would be if more care were given to the growing stock.

Cockerels intended for breeders should have every advantage that would tend to full and perfect development, and I prefer, when possible, to give them free range, isolated from hens and pullets. Next to free range comes large yards with well-littered, roomy coops or roosts out of doors. Good cockerels as I ever raised lived all summer in a yard without a coop. Poles were set up in the shade of a large apple tree, and on these the cockerels roosted. In event of a storm they sought the protection of a tree. They were a hardy, close-feathered bunch, and stood the rigors of a severe winter in an open house with the utmost comfort. At best they should only have a roof to protect them from the rain.

Hawks and crows often make life a burden to the poultryman in chicken time, where the growing chicks range. It is a good plan to erect poles about the chicken range, and run wire or strong twine zigzag from these, high enough to allow head room. From these lines suspend at frequent intervals, strips of white and colored cloth, bright bits of tin and pieces of glass. This is the most effective crow and hawk scare we know of, and it is well worth the expense and labor. Crows often become so bold that no other scarecrow will keep them from stealing young chicks, especially if bits of bright tin and glass are hung so that they will jingle in the breeze. Hawks generally come at the same time every day, so can be easily watched and shot.

Rats cause losses, and will frequently kill and hide a large number of chicks in a single night. Make the coops rat proof. Raise coops and boxes often, and kill any rats found beneath. A good rat dog is a great help. Traps are seldom effective, and poison is not safe in chicken time.

One of the most difficult problems which the poultry keeper has to meet is that of keeping his stock and poultry house reasonably free from lice, mites and other external parasites.

In keeping a poultry house free from lice, there are two points of attack; one, the birds themselves, the other the houses, the nest boxes, the roosting boards, etc.

In using any kind of lice powder on the birds themselves, it should always be remembered that a single application of powder is not sufficient. When there are lice present on a bird, there are always unhatched eggs of lice (nits) present, too. The proper procedure is to follow up the first application of powder with a second at an interval of four days to a week. If the birds are badly infested at the beginning it may be necessary to make still a third application. To clean the cracks and crevices of the woodwork of the houses and nests of vermin, a liquid spray or paint is probably the most desirable form of application.

So many of this month's inquiries have been about preventives or cures for gapes or bowel trouble, that I will take them for my text instead of trying to answer the individual letters. Bowel trouble usually attacks brooder chickens—perhaps I should have said incubator chickens which have been reared in a brooder—more frequently than it does chicks under hens, and the cause is usually want of sufficient heat. Little chicks can't stand being chilly. If you notice, even when hens are brooding, they will suffer if the hen happens to be a restless wanderer, and a cold, damp spell strikes us late in the spring. The brooder must be warm and well ventilated, and there should be a sheltered yard for them to exercise in for the first two or three weeks. If you are running a heated brooder, use a thermometer, and see that it keeps steadily at 95. If you have adopted the new fireless brooder, put plenty of cotton at the top, and never have less than twenty-five chicks to a brooder, for any less than that number can't supply sufficient bodily heat to warm up the air inside of the brooder. It is also well to cover the bottom of the brooder box with hay sweepings or cut hay, which is warm and soft for the little chicks to lie on. It is also very important to see that they go into their brooder at night, for they are very apt to run into some corner and huddle together, and of course become chilled before morning. Watch the droppings of all chickens, both brooder and those under the hens, and at the slightest indication of looseness of the bowels, remove the drinking water and replace with cold tea or rice water. It is a good precaution to feed boiled rice two or three times a week whilst the chicks are little, and if they develop any serious trouble, keep them under cover; or if with the hen, keep the hen shut into the brooder coop, for she is much more likely to brood than when allowed to run alone.

Leg weakness rarely if ever develops if the chickens are properly fed. Green food and animal food must form part of their rations. There is a meat meal on the market which is very good if you can buy in small quantities, but it is not safe to buy a large bag which cannot be used up within two or three weeks, so it is usually better for the ordinary farm to depend on curd cheese and an occasional hard-boiled egg, chopped up fine without removing the shell. And for green stuff I don't think there is anything as good as young clover and the young sprouts of onions, chopped fine enough, of course, to be acceptable for little chicks. If you are where you can get beef's liver, it is the best of all animal food, when about half boiled and chopped fine and fed in small quantities. If your birds have had any kind of animal meat from the start, it is quite safe; but if you suddenly commence to feed it after four or five weeks, you must go very carefully for some time until they become accustomed to it. A rusty nail or two, with a few drops of tincture of iron in the drinking water is a good tonic, and it is advisable to use it if chickens commence to look pale around the gills, or droopy in any way.

As I have explained before in these columns, gapes is really not a disease at all, but a parasite worm about one-sixteenth of an inch in length, and like a thin thread. They lodge in the windpipe and suck the blood of their victim. They are supposed to materialize only on ground on which poultry droppings have been deposited for several seasons. For this reason it is best to try and locate the brooder coops on fresh ground each year, or have the ground where they have stood heavily dressed with lime and plowed in in the fall. These wretched little worms multiply very quickly if they are not removed from the bird's throat, for the little chicks have not ejected them, no matter how

Gardening in May

FOR our readers who live in Northern States, the month of May sees gardening begin in real earnest, but those who live in the sunny Southland have long ago done their spading and seed planting, and are now perhaps gathering their first reward in the form of tasty and welcome garden "sass." Further north the fruit trees are in bloom, the birds have returned with their glad spring songs, and the sun's warmth is a real joy that bears only a promise of the heat to follow. Under these conditions it seems wrong to speak of gardening as work; in many respects it is play with the element of profit from garden truck thrown in for good measure. Would that only Life permitted us all to always turn work into play, then play to our own profit as we can in the garden!

Even if the instructions we gave for April have been followed, we make a guess that there are some things that have been overlooked. If this is true, then attend to them at once, for time lost now cannot well be regained. The seed for many of the vegetables is now in the ground; perhaps others have been transplanted to permanent and favorable locations. For these cultivation and thinning are the order of the day. Examine all seedbeds closely and re-seed in place of those that fail to grow. If good seed of strong vitality and germination has been purchased direct from the seedsmen as we have advised then little re-seeding will be necessary, however. All plants in cold frames will now need plenty of air and water to gradually harden them off before planting time. Plants grown in shallow beds close to the glass are less likely to become "spindling," weak and sickly. Strong root growth, thick short stems, and healthy dark green tops are far superior to "lanky," light-green ones. Toward the end of the month, if the season is warm, the more tender plants or seeds may be planted.

Garden Pests

Though we have never come across a census report on the matter, we risk a guess that insect pests are the bane of every gardener's existence. Several of the worst of "these plagued creatures" put in their first appearance in May, and if they are severely and promptly dealt with a lot of future trouble will be avoided. These first bugs are mainly the mature insects that have hibernated over winter, now coming forth to lay eggs for the new "crop," and by destroying either them or their eggs we may escape the next generation the numbers of which are legion.

Perhaps the most troublesome of all the spring garden pests is the cutworm, that naked and dirty gray or greenish-brown caterpillar that raises havoc with the cabbage and tomato plants as soon as set out and with corn—or anything else that is green, for that matter—as soon as it comes above ground. Working at night and burrowing under ground in the daytime, he is seldom caught at work, but the evidence remains in the morning in plants that appear to have been snipped off with scissors. About the only quick remedy is by poisoning. Take 50 pounds of bran, mix it dry with 1 pound of Paris green, then add water sweetened with molasses to make a mash. Do not get it too wet; just wet enough to stick together is sufficient. Place spoonfuls at frequent intervals in the rows of newly transplanted cabbage, cauliflower, strawberries or other plants. Scatter here and there around the borders of the garden close to patches of weeds or grass. Keep the chickens away as they will eat the bait to their own undoing. Young plants may also be protected by placing discs or "collars" of tar paper around the base of each, but by combining the two plans we are more certain to defeat the cutworm.

Trapping Slugs and Snails

Slugs and snails do considerable harm in gardens, but they can be kept within bounds by trapping. Lay cabbage leaves or slices of rutabaga on the ground between the rows in badly infested spots. The vermin will gather under or upon these baits or "traps" during the night and may be easily killed in the morning by sprinkling with lime or salt. Cabbage leaves heated until soft then rubbed with unsalted butter or any kind of fresh drippings free from salt, then placed on infested ground, will in a few hours be found covered with slugs, snails and an unusual assortment of injurious insects of all kinds. All that remains to be done is pick up the leaves and burn them, then prepare and set out new baits until the pests are brought under control. Also sprinkle slaked lime around growing plants, along edges of beds and about the rows of lettuce, peas, beans and other tender vegetables.

A Word About Garden Tools

Most of the tools needed for garden work are found as part of the ordinary equipment on the average farm. We can hardly imagine a farm without a spade, spading fork, rake, hoe, wheelbarrow, and some sort of a line that will serve as a garden tape. But there are other implements that should be added from time to time, the sooner the better. These are a trowel, extra hoes of special forms, cultivators or weeders, a marker (that can be made), and a hose or sprinkling can. A wheel hoe is a great labor saver that will take the place of several implements, since it makes furrows, hoes, harrows or rakes as fast as its operator can walk. If the garden is large then a seed drill attachment will be a welcome time and labor saver. A spray pump that can be carried on the back is a good investment for the small farm that does not boast a power sprayer for use in orchards or in potato fields.

There are any number of tools on the market designed to make garden work easier. Most of these are very useful if correctly used under right conditions—but there lies the question. From one part of our country to another conditions differ widely, and implements that are ideal in one locality for crops common there may be useless elsewhere. Therefore every gardener must to a certain extent try them out for himself, using home-made "makeshifts" until he thoroughly knows his own needs. In this way he will save expense and be sure of his needs before he buys.

Why Livestock Need Salt and Iodine

Today the problems of animal nutrition are receiving more attention than formerly, and the mineral needs of livestock are coming in for a great deal of study. Investigators have recently made important discoveries which show that the importance of minerals to animal growth and health that it is next to impossible to overestimate its importance. Nor have certain manufacturers lost time in placing upon the market mineral mixtures to meet the growing interest and increasing demand. Some of these mixtures are harmless or of doubtful value; others may even be harmful. Therefore we advise readers of COMFORT to avoid being mislead into buying unknowns. The mineral needs of livestock, so far as the farmer himself is concerned, are comparatively simple, being supplied mainly and sufficiently in the feed. Those that are for any reason deficient, moreover, may be safely and cheaply supplied in pure form, thus eliminating part of the expense and all of the possible danger involved in the purchase and use of mineral mixtures.

Salt Essential to Digestion

Most farmers provide salt for their livestock with but little thought as to why they do it. They know that farm animals in either barn or pasture, if not supplied with salt, will become "salt hungry." Salting stock is a habit that has been handed down to us from the dim and distant past; a habit that is followed in a sort of hit-or-miss way by a majority of feeders, without much thought being paid to amounts needed, what for, and why. Here are the reasons why salt is absolutely necessary if farm animals are to thrive as they should, as explained by Prof. E. B. Hart, of the Wisconsin College of Agriculture:

"It is necessary to supply salt to livestock for the reason that farm crops and mill feeds they eat are very low in the element chlorine, the particular element that common salt supplies very cheaply and in easily available form. The main use of salt is to make the hydrochloric acid found in the digestive juice of the stomach of all animals. This substance is absolutely essential if that organ is to properly perform its digestive action. Experiments have plainly demonstrated that the dairy cow, for example, cannot get along without receiving salt in quantity. Diminished milk flow and generally impaired physical condition soon follows if salt is not included in the ration she receives."

There are a number of practical ways of supplying salt. The commonest and simplest, perhaps, is to keep rock salt or block salt where each animal can help itself. This method serves better in pasture than in the barn, however. In winter salt may be sprinkled on coarse and unappetizing roughage to make stock "lick it up clean." Some farmers make it a practice to salt their clover hay as it is put into the mow. Others find that the prepared stock feeds they buy contain all the salt their animals need. A point to be remembered is that young stock need salt just as much as older stock. We know of many a dairyman who diligently salts his milk cows, but who supplies none whatever to his calves.

Iodine Prevents Goiter

Throughout the region of the Great Lakes, west through the Dakotas and even into the northern Mountain States we find that livestock is likely to suffer from goiter. This trouble may develop before birth and cause difficulty in breathing in the newborn offspring it may also develop later during the growing period. Goiter occurs in colts, calves and lambs as a more or less marked swelling of the thyroid gland of the throat. In newborn pigs it is indicated not so much by throat swelling as by absence of hair—the "hairless pigs" so common during the past few years. Again we give Prof. Hart's explanation and treatment based upon years of close study and extensive experiments:

"Though we do not yet know exactly what is the specific cause of goiter or hairlessness of pigs, we have found that it can be entirely prevented by supplying a small amount of extra iodine in the ration. We find that farm crops, unless they are grown close to the seashore, do not contain enough of this element, and perhaps this may explain the prevalence of the trouble in the North-Central States.

"To prevent hairlessness of pigs we recommend that the brood sows before and during the gestation period be given one-third of an ounce of potassium iodide in each 100 pounds of grain mixture. As a goiter preventive for all farm livestock, one-tenth pound of potassium or sodium iodide (use whichever one is the cheaper) for each 1,000 pounds of grain mixture would be sufficient. The very small amount of extra iodine in either of these forms that is required to prevent the trouble makes the cost quite small. Because of the results obtained by this treatment, we stand behind it and recommend the use of extra amounts of iodine for all livestock in regions where damage has resulted from goiter."

Poultry Need Summer Shade

Now is the right time to plan on summer shade of some sort for the poultry flock, for poultry confined in runs where there is no shade suffer severely during hot weather. This can easily be prevented if steps are taken to provide shade of some sort, either natural or artificial, and hens will thus be kept from falling off in egg production. Failure to provide shade soon manifests itself in poor condition of small chicks, resulting in severe setbacks or even worse. Ducks and geese are particularly liable to suffer from the ill effects of overheating. Little chicks, though they require a relatively high temperature while brooding, will be seriously affected if the heat becomes too high or if direct sunlight at midday is not kept off. Good shade protects from the sun and heat but still permits proper ventilation, a highly important point in profitable poultry raising.

much they cough and choke. Some of the remedies are as follows: Dip the end of a small wing feather in turpentine, push it down the bird's throat, turn two or three times quickly, and pull it out. The worm may come with it, but it is so small that it is difficult to tell. Another is, to mix salt and water, or steep tobacco in water for ten minutes; pour a teaspoonful down the bird's throat; keep the head up, and the two holes at the base of the bill covered with the thumb and forefinger whilst you count five; release, and suddenly turn the bird upside down, holding by the feet. It will gasp, splutter, and usually eject the worm. But, really, I think it is much better to make a practice of putting the coops on clean ground, for trying to doctor little chicks is awfully difficult work.

L. T. W.—Scaly leg does not affect the bird's health or egg production. It is caused by a tiny parasite which breeds in old dirty perches. Clean and paint the perches with sheep dip, naphtha or gasolene. Do the work early in the morning, and keep the birds out of the house until the roosts are dry, or they may get their feet blistered. Fill a two-quart pail with warm, soapy water, and hold the bird's feet and shanks in it for ten minutes at least, to soften the old, scaly skin. Then scrub with a soft brush and plenty of white soap. Wipe on a clean rag and whilst still warm and moist rub with carbolic vaseline or a mixture of flour of sulphur and lard.

F. H.—Please read answer to L. T. W., in this issue.

H. N.—Write to the U. S. Department of Agriculture, Washinton, D. C., for bulletin on poultry house construction.

J. C.—I think you must have given your young ducks too much corn. Oats, bran and middlings, with a little animal meal, is a good mixture for growing ducks.

F. H.—Please read answer to L. T. W. in this issue.

A. H.—One service fertilizes the whole clutch of eggs. If the tom is a vigorous bird between the ages of fifteen months and five years, you can be quite sure of the hen bird's egg being fertile if they have been shut up in an enclosure for forty-eight hours.

G. E.—The breeding stock must be in a very poor condition, or the older chickens have infected the young ones. Chickenpox is a contagious disease, so you must clean and disinfect the houses, coops, etc.

E. M. B.—From your description of the old turkeys in the fall of the year, and the young ones last summer, there is little doubt that your stock has contracted the disease commonly known as blackhead. As your fowls can also become infected from the turkeys' droppings, you had better keep them widely separated. Clean up the whole premises, and give sour milk or whey from clabbered milk to drink. Set eggs from turkeys under common hens. Keep the brood coops on clean, fresh ground, far removed from other poultry, and you may succeed in raising some of them.

W. H.—The turkeys and hens have malignant roup. Make a saturated solution of permanganate of potassium, and for use dilute one teaspoonful of the solution with three of water; fill a small syringe, and spray the throat, nostrils and eyes night and morning. Keep the birds in small coops, far removed from other poultry. Remember, it will not be safe to use eggs from any of these birds for setting, no matter how perfect their recovery may seem. Clean and disinfect the poultry house, feed and water vessels, and all fixtures.

I. L. G.—The poultry house must be poorly ventilated and damp, or you have too many birds crowded into a small house. Take out the window sash and cover the space with unbleached muslin, to allow a free circulation of fresh air. Rub the feet and shanks with a mixture of turpentine and sweet oil. Read answer to W. H., and use the permanganate solution as recommended for eyes and throat.

E. B.—Please read answer to W. H. in this issue.

C. H.—The description, as given of the sick birds, suggests a light attack of roup. Instructions and dimensions for making the trap nests were given in one of the early spring numbers of COMFORT. Please look up your back numbers; I haven't them at hand.

Comfort's League of Cousins

inside just as much as I do. All this laughing has to be done inside, and I have to keep my grins hidden; for if Bill found out that his harmless vanity amused me so, he would be tremendously offended. And when Billy is really offended, Isabel, even you couldn't love him. And speaking of photographs, of course you should send yours for Bill's album. You might have a snapshot taken eating fudge. This would be the sweetest sort of a pose!

Isabel, if you want my candid—or should I say "candied"?—opinion, I'll say that if such things must be (and they don't really have to happen), but if they must, I'd rather see a girl use powder than to see a boy chew tobacco. There might sometimes be an excuse for the first, but never for the second. But, on the other hand, I can, with an effort, contemplate a sixteen-year-old boy smoking a cigarette, when I would feel much worse to see rouge spoiling the natural freshness of a young girl. So there you are with my honest opinion. But for our Family, let's have just as little powder, paint and tobacco as possible. These are all inventions of man who was once "made upright," —and pretty poor inventions they are. Now fudge is much nicer—and much less harmful.

You must not mention Bill's gray whiskers, Isabel, if you want him to keep on liking you. The first thing you know he will be getting them dyed! So if you see a dignified-looking Goat with yellow whiskers, and slightly lame in the left foreleg, walking up to your door in Charlotte some day, you will know that Billy has accepted your invitation and has arrived to eat a pan or two of your divine home-made fudge.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for May

"Inasmuch as you have done it unto the least of these you have done it unto Me."

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Every month brings to me letters which disregard this simple and necessary rule. Appeals unaccompanied by the references required will be destroyed.

Faye Smith, Greenfield, Mo. A little cripple girl of eight, cut off from school and play, asks for cards, picture books, or anything to "pass the time away." Mrs. Sophronia Watson, Boomer, N. C. Struggling to support herself and her two children of six and thirteen. Second-hand clothes will help—but second-hand dollars will help more. Isaac Price, Lenoir, N. C. Helpless from rheumatism since 1871. A sad and worthy case. Miss Roma Coleman, Cuthbert, R. R. 2, Ga., and Miss Perdie G. Holland, Wilsonville, Box 63, Ala. Both ask that COMFORT women readers will write them to help lonely, cheerless hours. John Jackson, Slocomb, R. R. 1, Ark. Although it is too late for John's birthday of March 10th, it is not too late to give this little crippled shut-in boy of nine a shower of postcards and cheering letters. This is very little he asks, but it means a lot to him. Laura Janes, Cambrio, O. Deformed and helpless. Clothes and a dime shower will be brighteners for this poor woman.

Here is another list of those with whom life has dealt hardly, and who must turn to others for the cheer they cannot gain themselves and for the support they cannot earn. Some ask so little—only messages of cheer. For others, clothes to cover them and money to buy food is the only possible answer or aid. Give as you can and as you must. You will walk happier in the spring sunshine after you have done your part to these who have but little of springtime in their lives.

Lovingly,

Uncle Lisha

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

How to become a Member

Send fifty-five cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Round Prairie Observes Mothers' Day

and sent them to Betty, the Buyer. It seemed a little insignificant thing to do, and yet——

About a month later Ephraim Blake hailed him as he drove past his house.

"I say," he said, "I thought you were the man who didn't believe in giving your wife these modern contraptions. It's all over town that you are planning on the purchase of a washing-machine for Maria. Jess Edwards said so, and Joe Stoddard, and Bill Brinckley, and half a dozen others. And since they found that you're going to make your wife's work easier they've all decided they can do as well by their women-folks. When you planning to get it? Somehow it occurred to me it would be sort of a nice thing to do for us all to keep mum about our plans to our wives and then all send together for our washing-machines—p'raps we could get a little off buying them wholesale as it were—and plan to have them delivered the day before this Mothers' Day we've heard so much about these last few years. Somehow it strikes me they'd make Monday more of a Mothers' Day than any pink-wearing Sunday ever was."

Andrew Josephs' tongue was seized with a sudden stroke of paralysis. He couldn't say a word: he hadn't a word to say! He saw Betty the Buyer's hand in the business only too well. On the strength of his continued interest in the subject of washing-machines, she had written all the neighbors whose names he had sent her that he, Andrew Josephs, was planning on the purchase of an electric washer! And now the dum fools had all gone and decided to buy electric washers for their wives, and—why, there was no way out of it—he'd just have to buy one for Maria! He couldn't lose his prestige among Round Prairie folks!

At last the tongue loosened. Andrew endeavored to speak unconcernedly.

"I think," he said, unconsciously bringing forward Betty the Buyer's arguments, "it's about time we thought a little about our women-folks. Machines, even good ones, wear out; why shouldn't our women?"

"Exactly!" replied his listener. "Somehow we have always seemed to think they would last forever. But what do you think about this Mothers' Day plan? Mothers' Day is just two weeks from tomorrow—just about time to arrange things."

"Mighty good idea! You arrange with the men down here and bring all their orders to me and I'll fix the entire order up." (Perhaps he thought to himself, I can get a better commission than that ten dollars for names on the sale of nearly a dozen washing-machines!)

* * * * * * *

Two weeks from the following Monday, Maria Josephs, dress changed, hair tidily arranged, sat rocking beside the table with its red and white, checker-board patterned cloth, reading the belated Sunday paper. Suddenly she dropped the sheet she was holding.

"Andrew," she said, with a suggestion of youthful laughter in her voice, "what night is this?"

"Why, Monday, of course," replied her husband. "Why?"

"Why? Why, because I never felt like this on a Monday before. I'm not one bit tired tonight, and I put through all our winter blankets and everything I could lay my hands on this morning."

She picked up the paper she had dropped.

"I think," she mused, "I'll have to write a second letter. You know, Andrew, several months ago when I was all played out doing the weekly washing, I wrote to this Betty person at Louden's Store and told her how much I wanted a washing-machine but that my husband wouldn't listen to me when I mentioned my desire to him. I asked her how I could get you to buy me one. And she never answered me. I always thought it funny, for Louden's "ad" always states that every letter is answered; but I suppose that was a question no woman in the world could answer helpfully. Somehow I feel as if I ought to write her and tell her that my husband bought me a washer as a surprise, all of his own accord."

Andrew Joseph's eyes grew big behind his paper as he heard his wife's confession. So that was how it all came about, was it? That was how Louden's Betty the Buyer got his name and certain facts about him! The credit, then, all went back to Maria. Well—he gazed through the smoke haze made by his pipe at the softly-outlined figure of his wife, looking tonight so care-free and youthful—he was glad she did it. In truth, he hadn't understood.

"Do as you please, Maria," he answered, the corners of his eyes wrinkling with merriment as he thought of the stack of orange-hued letters he had that morning consigned to the flames of the kitchen fire.

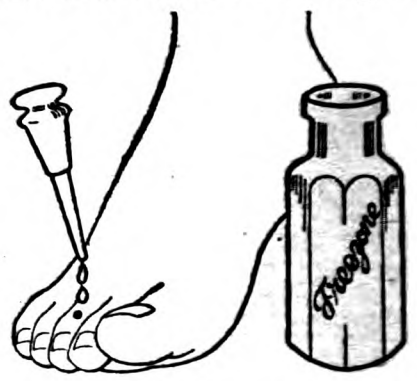
to get me off with a light sentence, officer. We took the jewels from Mr. Blair's house party."

Eudora breathed a startled "My Gawd!" Mrs. Roach swooned in Jupiter's arms, while Pat ejaculated, "Very clever of you, Suzanne; very clever, indeed."

Finnegan looked about in amazement, but sensing that he had inadvertently stumbled upon bigger game than he expected, took his cue and said:

"Into ther waggin wid yez, one an' all, an' we'll be after straightenin' matters out at hidquarters wid th' lootenant."



After Kilmansegg had signed his confession, Suzanne, Pat and Mammy departed in Pat's car.

"Ready to marry me now?" Pat asked, as Mammy dozed in the tonneau.

"Yes, I love usual people, they're so dependable," was Suzanne's rejoinder.

SPECIAL SALE PRICE with a six (6) months' subscription to THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION ONLY 25 CENTS.
This Book contains one of this noted author's best novels.

Pressed close against the window pane was a wan, white face.

The pathos of this story sweeps all before it. It touches the heart of humanity everywhere. Even the man with a heart of stone learns from this story that deep down under the cold, hard strata of stone, he has in his heart a deep well of human sympathy for the erring one; that he has also a heart capable of love and admiration for the good and noble character of Luella, the gentle, loving, self-sacrificing sister. Righteous indignation aroused toward Silas Lockwood, her relentless and unnatural father. The heart's emotions like a great ocean billow, rolls on from the beginning to end of the book; when you lay it down and say blessed is God who rules over all for the good of all. Thousands will want to read this book and pass it on to their friends. Libbie Sprague Phillips writes exclusively for THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION; has done so for 16 years. One minister has furnished it with sermons for 13 years; other writers have contributed regularly for years. THE ILLUSTRATED COMPANION is 43 years old. The years of continued service of its writers show that our magazine is one of fixed and standard worth. We know you will enjoy reading it. Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. A. C., Norwood, La.—It is permitted nowadays that invitations to far more formal affairs than your boy and girl dance may be given by telephone. So use the friendly wire if you wish to save yourself time and stationery. Or you might write short and simple notes for which the following would suggest the form:

MY DEAR JACK:

I am planning to give a little dance at my house on blank evening, blank date, at blank o'clock. I would like so much to have you come. Will you let me know if you can?

Sincerely,

and finish up with your name and the date when you are sending your notes of invitation—which should be well in advance of the time you are to give your party. The advantage of telephoning your invitations is that by this method you know almost at once who can come and who cannot. (2) Fourteen is not too young for a girl to learn how to cook, or to acquire any other details of the fine art of homemaking. There is as much good manners in a well-baked pan of fluffy biscuits as there is in a new dance step.

SUBSCRIBER, Rison, Ark.—At the end of the meal is the time that cake and the great American pie make their appearance. A pie or layer cake can be placed on the table to be cut and served by the hostess. A pie is sometimes quite properly left in the pan in which it has been baked—particularly if it is some attractive cullinary attempt which would be easily injured. In such a case a napkin may be placed about the pan to cover it before serving. (2) In setting a table, knives and glassware are placed at the right, and forks and bread and butter plates upon the left. Where a maid is lacking to serve, convenience and common sense should govern your arrangement of any simple home dinner, more than any effort to conform with rules of etiquette as to table service and good form.

A. T., Bernie, Mo.—When the president of your club thanks you for having entertained the members at your home, why not say: "If you have all had the good time I've had in having you here, I am happy, you may be sure. Remember it has been just as much my good time as yours!" (2) No reply is needed when a clerk uses the customary phrases of thanking you for your purchase and asks you to "call again."

F. P., Blum, Texas.—To get a "lump in your throat" when reading or speaking in public is not a new or rare complaint. In fact, at sixteen, it is rather a natural one for which time is the best and generally sure remedy. You are probably unduly sensitive and a little too finely-nerved. Try to forget yourself as much as possible in what you are doing and cease to think that everyone has attention riveted upon you for purposes of criticism. They may be thinking that you are doing very well indeed. If you are reading or speaking, keep your mind on reading or speaking just as well as you can and let the rest take care of itself. Anything that aids you physically is apt to help your nervous timidity, but time and practice in meeting people and speaking before them is your only remedy.

BROWN EYES, North Carolina.—A bride does not wear a hat at her wedding, unless she is to be married in her going-away costume. You should not plan to wear a hat if your wedding gown is to be of white satin. If you are married in your traveling costume, your hat should be a small one which harmonizes in color with your selected plainly-tailored suit. (2) Whether you would remove your coat on the train, would depend entirely on the temperature. We advise you against traveling, even in summer, in any light-colored frock of thin material.

READER OF COMFORT, Virginia.—If your father cannot aid you with money, and you cannot yourself earn enough for your support, we do not see how you can plan to establish yourself in the city. In any event, no fifteen-year-old girl should leave a farm home and enter a big city with the idea of earning her living. Surely your father, or anyone else who knows of your plans, would advise you wisely against this. If you had old friends or relatives in the city, whose home you could enter and who could aid you to get work that might prove self-supporting, there might be some excuse for your wish to leave home. As it is, we think you should remain at home until you have, either through your own efforts or your father's labor, secured funds that would give you a safe and sure start in new and strange surroundings. And in the meantime you will be getting a few years older. We congratulate you on your pluck and ambition—but these must not outrun safety and common sense.

KENTUCKY BELLE, Center, Ky.—A man is always supposed to be capable of getting on his own coat without a girl's assistance. Do not offer to aid your caller in this way. (2) A girl of sixteen may have boys call upon her if her parents do not object, but at this age she is too young to "go" with any particular boy or to receive serious attentions from young men older than herself. Sixteen and younger are the ages only for school books and school boys—which reminds us that you write "permissable" when your spelling book would demand "permissible."

DIMPLES, Joplin, Mo.—There is nothing easier to start than gossip and probably Joplin is no exception to this rule. So, considering that you are really the head of your junior household, it might be well to avoid any censorious remarks by not inviting your escort into your home when you return at a rather late hour of the evening. (2) Yes; you may ask your caller to come again, if you think he is the kind that needs encouragement. Boys are often bashful creatures and need a kind word or two to help their timid hearts.

BUTTERCUP, South Carolina.—If the party in the room numbers no more than five or six, a new arrival would be expected to make the round of the guests—shaking hands with those known and being introduced to faces that were strange.

LONESOME, South Carolina.—Why do you say you "cannot think of anything to say" when you go anywhere? Certainly you should be able to join in the same topics of conversation as others of your friends. Listen to what they say; watch what they do; and then play the part of an interested imitator, at least. Don't think that others must care about your having "a grand or bad time." Pitch in and have a grand time yourself and make others have one, also. You are "lonesome" because you are self-conscious and self-centered. Take a hand in making other people happy and you will find yourself happy, too—and a lot less lonesome.

GRAYCE, Oklahoma.—You should thank a boy who has escorted you home, or extended any like courtesy. But we think it is he who should be grateful for the dance. (2) If a boy is walking on the street with one girl or with two, he would take his place nearest the curb—the principle being that he is thus in a position to guard against accidents of traffic, mud, etc. While this rule and other considerations would prevent a man walking between two girls, there is no objection to a girl taking her place between two escorts and thus being twice guarded and amused. We congratulate you on your delightful handwriting.

S. M. D., Lexington, Va.—The ideal average weight for a girl of eighteen who is five feet, five inches in height, would be 126 pounds. You do not give your age, which we only guess. If you are younger, this average would be about a pound lighter for each year; and if you are older, add at the same rate to the weight given. (2) As a general rule, brown is a color which would make a young girl, with pale complexion, look older than she really is. If you wear brown, choose the lighter shades, tending towards tans and fawn color. With your hair and eyes, you could becomingly wear all shades of blue, particularly the darker tints. Those newer henna colorings, the lighter ones, might be suitably worn, also. Avoid all greens, unless very dark shades of this color.

Hair of Grey

By Margaret A. Bartlett

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

WHEN a young woman—a woman really young in years—discovers that grey hairs are streaking her hair, no one can blame her if she resorts to artificial means to restore the hair's natural color. A young and youthful face was never meant to be framed with hair of grey. The greyness may be a result of some sickness, or merely the result of impoverished hair-cells resulting from one cause or another; but it is unnatural, and not to be desired.

But when a woman has reached middle age and passed it, when the greater part of life's battles have been fought and won—or—lost—when she has seen life in its varying colors and phases, then she is more unfortunate than otherwise if her hair persists in keeping its color. On her face has been chiseled a picture of the life she has led: character is revealed in every line: and the one proper setting for such a picture is a frame of silver.

"But grey hairs make one look so old," bemoaned a dear friend of mine, an active, keen-minded, yet gentle, motherly woman in her sixties, "and I don't want to look old!"

Her hair should have been grey—it had been years ago it first showed its streaks of silver—but she had never allowed it to turn. She had used bottle after bottle of hair restorer to keep it "youthful looking," and she salved her New England conscience by admitting frankly to all she knew that she colored her hair.

She thought it made her look younger, and she rejoiced in the fact that even though her friends knew she dyed her hair, still they didn't know how she would look were her hair as white as doubtless it would by now, without the bottle of dye, be.

But the dye, home applied, did not bring about a natural color. If by any chance a regular application was missed, the hair took on a dingy, streaked look that would have been unbecoming to the most beautiful woman of thirty. Besides, the dark frame did not harmonize with the picture beneath it. Generally the face had color, but it was not the youthful color of long ago. Neither was the skin smooth and of fine texture, and there were wrinkles, wrinkles placed there by love and sacrifice, worry and work, household cares and the responsibility of little children and growing young men and women, wrinkles that were as the printed word on a virgin sheet of paper. The dark hair accentuated those wrinkles till they seemed at times but hard lines; it withered still more the far from young skin and mocked at the trace of color in the cheeks.

Dear woman who didn't want to grow old! How little she realized how much she was contributing to the appearance of age in her face!

A winter without snow is a dismal, cheerless winter. The bare trees, the ugly fences, the brown earth are old and dreary and sad to look upon when the cold winter winds sweet over them. But let snow fall, and immediately the landscape forms a different picture. Everywhere one sees peace and calm, quietness and content. Every ugly line has become a soft dimple of beauty. No hardness remains; nothing but an infinite softness and gentleness.

Thus should snow fall in the winter of life. There may be a period between the glowing fall and the dead of winter that is hard to bear. There may be a stretching of pleading arms back to the days of youth and sunshine but the winter winds still will strike, and beauty only will be lost if no softening snows flutter down.

If you be no longer young, let your hair grow grey and fade to white with no regret. God intended it to be thus. White hair never made one old in spirit; it never dimmed the eye nor took the laugh out of the voice. A young heart may flourish in an aged body; a keen mind in a year-worn head. The color of the hair is not so significant as the spirit which flashes from the eyes. Yet the greyness or whiteness of maturity soften and beautify the face and turn ugly wrinkles into character lines of beauty. Unless your life has been a blank, give your hair a chance to aid in the delineation of character your no longer youthful face reveals.

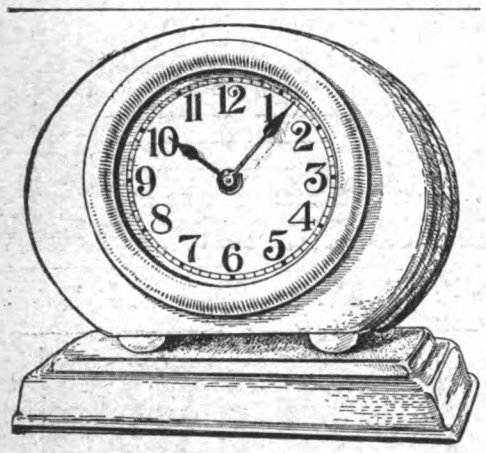
Reward No. 9882

Full Opera Length



THE dream of every woman and girl is to possess her own necklace of gleaming, iridescent pearls. There's a wonderful fascination about them—a beauty that appeals to every feminine heart.

Now your dream can come true—for we are giving away this handsome, full opera length rope of Parisian pearls. It is 54 inches long, all the pearls are of uniform size—¼ inch in diameter—of perfect finish and luster, far handsomer than the ordinary imitation pearl necklace sold at a high price. It can easily be wound twice around the neck, making the double rope as shown in our illustration.

By rare good luck we secured first choice of these necklaces from a large importer and at a price that enables us to give them for an unusually small club. Please read the following offer and learn how you can get a beautiful, 54-inch rope of pearls free of all cost.

Given To You! For only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each, we will send you this handsome, opera length Pearl Necklace free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 9882.

Comfort's Home Lawyer

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MRS. R. A. B., Missouri.—Under the laws of Texas, we are of the opinion that no partition can be had of the homestead during the lifetime of a surviving husband or wife, or so long as the survivor may elect to use or occupy the same as a homestead, or so long as the guardian of minor children may be permitted to occupy same by order of court, and we think this homestead right is protected to the surviving husband or widow and minor children against the testamentary provisions in the will of the deceased consort; we think that after the homestead rights of the surviving consort and minor children are terminated, homesteads descend as other real property.

MRS. G. R., Kentucky.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that 90 per cent. of the wages or salaries of persons earning $75 per month or less is exempt by law from levy under execution; we think that if you can substantiate the fact that the doctor who operated upon you was grossly negligent in making the diagnosis of your case, he would not be entitled to collect from you for his services.

MRS. D. O., New Jersey.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that it is necessary to record a deed to real estate in order to protect the owner thereof against the rights of subsequent purchaser of the land who purchases in good faith and without notice of the prior deed; we think, however, that if the holder of the first deed of the property you mention, entered into possession of the land and continued to hold such possession, this would constitute notice of ownership to the purchaser who holds the later deed of the property, but this state of facts would constitute a cloud upon the title and might necessitate a court action for the removal of the defect in the title.

MRS. A. C., Arkansas.—Under the laws of Kentucky, we are of the opinion that if your brother survived your grandfather, and if he became vested with a remainder interest in your grandfather's estate, his death before the death of the life tenant, would not defeat the claim of his legal representatives to their share in your grandfather's estate.

MRS. J. M., Wisconsin.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a mortgage may be foreclosed as soon as there is a default in the payment of either principal or interest.

J. M. C., Montana.—If the administrator of the estate you mention refuses to account to the persons entitled to an interest therein, after the period allowed for administration expires, we think it will be necessary to commence proceedings against him to compel him to do so.

L. P., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of either the husband or wife one-half of the common property goes to the survivor and the remainder to the child or children of the deceased; we think that under certain circumstances children's rights to a deceased parent's share in community property may be barred by the statute of limitations.

A. G., Oregon.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving husband and one child as her only heirs at law and next of kin, her surviving husband would receive curtesy of a life estate in one-half of the real estate, and one-half of the personal estate absolutely, the balance of the estate going to the child.

MRS. M. W. K., Ohio.—If your debtor refuses or neglects to pay the interest on his mortgage debt to you, we think it will be necessary for you to foreclose the mortgage in order to enforce the payment of the same; we think you would be very foolish to allow your relationship to your debtor to interfere with your property rights.

MRS. A. S., Arkansas.—We think the holder of the note you mention can enforce the payment of the same from either the maker or endorser of such note.

S. P., Kansas.—We think the laws of your state prohibit marriages between first cousins, and that such a marriage in your state would subject the parties to punishment for such act; we do not think there is any Federal law prohibiting such a marriage, but, as above stated, the state law would govern; we do not think the laws of any state require the consent of the parents where both parties are over 21 years of age.

MRS. E. S., Montana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the maker of the note you mention does not pay same, the endorser can be held for such payment. (2) We think such a liability can be discharged by bankruptcy, provided the schedules are properly drawn. (3) We think a transfer of property, made for the purpose of avoiding the payment of a debt, could be set aside in the proper action brought for the purpose.

MRS. N. L., Louisiana.—We think it will be necessary for you to have an examination made of the records in order to determine whether the land owned by you was legally sold during your minority; we think such sale would be legal if made in a legal manner.

MRS. A. S., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the holder of a note can compel the endorser to pay same if the maker of such note defaults in the payment when the same becomes due; we think that after such payment by the endorser he is entitled to collect in turn from the maker of the note.

MRS. M. G. C., Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant living at the time of his death, his widow in addition to her homestead rights and certain small allowances, would be entitled to receive dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate and one-half of the surplus, after payment of debts and expenses of the personal property, and in addition thereto she shall be entitled to all of the surplus remaining of the personal property as shall have been acquired by the intestate in virtue of his marriage to her if the same occurred prior to April 4, 1877.

A. L., Philippine Islands.—Under your laws, we are of the opinion that all property belonging to either husband or wife before marriage remains the personal property of the original owner. Property acquired during marriage and improvements on property acquired before marriage belong to the conjugal partnership and constitute the community property. The husband is the head of the community and administers the community property except when declared judicially absent, insane or suffering civil interdiction, or when separated. Before marriage a contract may be executed stipulating the conditions for the conjugal partnership with regard to future and present property. Gifts between spouses during marriage are void, except moderate gifts on occasions of birthdays, wedding anniversaries, etc. Parents are bound to give a dowry to their legitimate daughters of one-half of their legitimate portion and the dowry may be estimated or appraised or unestimated. The ownership of the estimated dowry passes to the husband, who upon dissolution of the marriage, must return its value. The husband is the administrator of the unestimated dowry, and upon dissolution of the marriage the same property constituting the dowry must be returned. The separate or personal property of the wife is administered by her unless she transfers the administration to her husband. The wife cannot alienate or mortgage her dowry or paraphernal property without the consent of her husband. Upon dissolution of the marriage an inventory is taken, and after deducting debts and charges, husband and wife share equally in the community property.

MRS. F. G., Missouri.—If your husband is disposing of your property, we think you should refuse to allow him to do so; we think if he forges your name to deeds or other instruments it may be necessary for you to have him punished for so doing.

MRS. C. H. G., West Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, his surviving widow is entitled to receive all the personal estate, after payment of debts and expenses, and dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate, the balance of the real estate going to his parents, brothers and sisters or their descendants, depending upon who is left.

MRS. J. G., Montana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a husband cannot be compelled to support his wife if she abandons him, without just cause, but that he can be compelled to provide separate support for her in case the court finds his treatment of her was such as to necessitate her leaving him.

MRS. F. C. N., Montana.—We do not think the laws of your state provide for community ownership of the property acquired by onerous title after marriage; we think the husband can be compelled to support his wife unless she abandons him without just cause, and that in case she survives him he cannot bar her from her inheritance rights in his estate; we think in case the husband deserts his wife, without good cause, she can enforce her right to support from him against any property he may own.

MRS. J. T. B., Minnesota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and children by two marriages, his widow, in addition to her homestead rights, if any, and certain small allowances from the personal estate, would receive one-third of both the personal and real estate, after the payment of debts and expenses, the balance of the estate going to the children of both marriages in equal shares.

MRS. B. L., Oregon.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that upon the death of a married man, leaving no child nor descendant, and leaving no will, his surviving widow would receive the entire estate after payment of debts and expenses.

G. W. L., Wisconsin.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the surviving husband cannot enforce his curtesy rights to the real estate of his deceased wife against her children by a former husband to whom such land has descended.

MRS. G. F., Missouri.—If the deed to the property you mention is drawn so that it creates a tenancy by the entirety to yourself and husband, we think the whole property upon the death of one becomes the sole property of the survivor; we think it will be necessary for your husband to leave a will if he desires you to receive his whole estate as even though you are probably entitled to receive all of the real estate if the title stands in both of your names as tenants by the entirety, you will only receive a child's part of the personal estate if he leaves no will, and leaves surviving descendants.

SURE QUICK DEATH FOR RATS AND MICE

Remarkable Triple Strength Virus Kills Every One Not a Poison

MARVELOUS FRENCH DISCOVERY

Rats are your enemies. They destroy your buildings, eat your grain, kill your poultry, start fires and spread disease in every community. You need no longer suffer these losses—You can now, in a week's time easily kill every rat, mouse or gopher with Rat Virus, the great French discovery. Our triple strength virus is the most powerful concentrated deadly virus known, the only sure, safe rodent destroyer.

Triple Strength Virus is absolutely safe to use anywhere—positively not a poison. No danger to chickens, horses, cattle, hogs or dogs. Harmless to children or grown persons. Affects only rodents.

Triple Strength Virus is prepared in a scientific laboratory and contains only Virus germs deadly to rodents. The bottle and corks are sterilized and sealed air-tight, so that all other germs are excluded. This is why Triple Strength is so deadly. It is tested on rats, mice and gophers before shipment—it cannot fail.

Rats Die Outside

Triple Strength Rat Virus is easy to use. Simple directions show how. A single rat eating the virus gets sick with a contagious plague disease that affects and kills all rats and mice in the immediate vicinity. Rats flee because they become infected with a plague that affects the heart, blood vessels, and lungs, destroying the blood corpuscles and causing suffocation. The rats rush outside where they get fresh air and water. When the diseased rats get ouside, they never get back for the disease is then so far gone it kills them. No odor, no dead rats to handle, no live rats to kill.

Special Introductory Offer

We want to prove to you our claim that Triple Strength Rat Virus is the most potent, most powerful—yet non-poisonous and absolutely safe—rat virus on the market. It is a TRIPLE STRENGTH Virus. Contains more living rat virus germs than any other rat killer made and will go one-third to one-half farther. To introduce this powerful Triple Strength Rat Virus, we will make every reader of this paper—for short time only—a special offer of a regular $2.50 bottle for only $1.00 postpaid. This $2.50 bottle Triple Strength Rat Virus is enough to clear a poultry house, home or yard of rats and mice. Should you have several buildings infested with rats, it will pay you to send $2.00 for our big $5.00 Jumbo Size bottle. This Jumbo size bottle contains three times the quantity of Triple Strength Virus as our regular $2.50 bottle sold for $1.00. Send order today sure.

Money Back Guarantee

Your money back if it fails. Take no chances this year with traps or rat poisons. Triple Strength Rat Virus will positively kill rats, mice and gophers and be absolutely safe and sure. Give it according to directions—if after 30 days' trial you find any rats or mice—we will refund your money without question.

If not convenient to send money today—just send your name and address, a postal will do—pay postman on arrival. Remember it costs you nothing if it does not do all we claim.

VETERINARY INFORMATION

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lack the sender's full name and address, but we will prin only initials if so requested.

LUNG WORMS.—Can you give me a remedy for lung worms in calves? I had three die with them. They had diarrhea, complete loss of appetite, eyes sunk back in the head. They coughed slightly, and after death I found the lungs were clogged with white worms about two inches long. They died in a week after developing the above symptoms. J. E. R.

A.—There is no certain remedy for lung worms. The eggs are taken in on old grass, and on farms where the worms have caused trouble calves should be raised in pens and yards for the first 12 months of their lives and should be kept off pasture. The usual treatment consists in fumigating infested calves with burning sulphur or vaporized iodine, or in injecting a chloroform mixture directly into the windpipe. Consult the local veterinarian about that. Generous feeding is imperative.

LAME MULE.—My mule at times is lame in her left hind leg. When I first noticed the lameness she would walk on her toe for a few steps, and then would walk all right again. Now she steps ahead and does not let her foot go far enough back and rests it. She does all the work I require and does not show lameness when pulling. R. M. H.

A.—Ringbone around the hoofhead often causes such lameness. If an enlargement is found there clip off the hair and blister the part several times at intervals of two or three weeks with a mixture of two drams each of powdered cantharides and biniodide of mercury and three ounces of lard. Without an examination, however, we are unable to say for sure what is causing the lameness.

FOUNDER.—I have a twelve-year-old mare that has been foundered. Her front feet are soft and will not hold the shoe more than two weeks. She is a little lame at times. Her head is stiff where the head joins the neck. When grazing she puts one foot back and the other forward which seems to make her fore legs stiff. What can I do for her? G. A. T.

A.—Chronic founder causes a horse to thrust both fore feet well forward and go on his heels when starting to walk. We scarcely think that founder is present in the case described. To toughen the feet so that they will hold nails apply to the juncture of the horn and hair of the hoofs every other day a mixture of one part of oil of tar and two parts of oil of balsam of fir. They should then hold nails in about six weeks, after which apply the treatment twice a week.

DEATH OF DOG.—Will you tell me what caused the death of a dog affected as described? She was sick four days. The first sign of any sickness was when she began slobbering a few times a day. For three days she ate good and seemed all right except when she had these spells. They were more violent when she tried to get her jaws apart. The fourth day she was paralyzed and could neither eat nor drink. I went to a veterinarian and he said it was worms and prescribed areca nut. MRS. A. E. C.

A.—The symptoms are highly suggestive of the dumb form of rabies or madness from the bite of an affected dog. Death takes place inside of a week. The affected dog is often thought to have a bone in its throat. The voice changes to a half bark, half howl. The eyes have an unnatural look, one pupil being dilated and the other contracted besides being gummy with mucous. There is no remedy. Worms often cause fits and temporary unconsciousness. Areca nut is useful to kill worms. After starving a dog for 24 hours, give one dram of fluid extract of male-fern and 20 grains of powdered areca nut in a tablespoonful of simple syrup. Repeat the dose in four or five days. That is the dose for each 25 pounds of body weight of dog.

HEAVES.—My horse has heaves. Can you tell me what will help him? D. J. W.

A.—Feed wet oat straw and corn stover instead of hay and also allow oats, wheat bran and carrots. In summer let the horse live on grass. Wet the feed with lime-water. In each feed mix a teaspoonful of a mixture of equal quantities by weight of powdered stramonium leaves and chlorid of ammonia. Do not give any bulky feed at noon when the horse has to work hard and do not work him immediately after a meal.

CANCER OF EYE.—I have a steer that has a bad eye. Pus has formed in it for some time. The lid is inflamed and he appears to be blind. R. P.

A.—There can be little question that the steer is afflicted with cancer of the eye (fungus hematoids), and treatment will not now be likely to help. If cut out and cauterized when first noticed recovery may ensue. If the steer is otherwise well, eating normally and in good flesh, it may safely be slaughtered for meat. That cannot be done after the animal has become emaciated.

PARALYSIS.—I have a hog, eight months old, that suddenly lost all use of its hind legs. The hog had a large field in which to run and was fed on corn and table scraps. Is there any remedy? D. W. L.

A.—Such paralysis is generally brought on by constipation from lack of exercise and errors in diet. Such causes should be removed. A quarter of a pound of juniper berries boiled with mill feed and given in three equal doses in one day often proves remedial.

I. E., Simpson, Va.—Every senator and congressman is permitted to appoint two cadets to the U. S. Military Academy at West Point, N. Y. There are also eighty-two appointments at large in the hands of the President. All of these appointments are usually made one year in advance of date of admission. Many senators and congressmen are in the habit of granting these designations to the Academy after a competitive examination. Appointment does not necessarily mean admission, as all successful candidates must pass a rather difficult examination—one which would be equal to a carefully completed high school course. Candidates may also be admitted upon presentation of a certificate showing their past satisfactory school work, but if they are unable to keep up with the classes at the Academy, they are promptly dropped. The required course at West Point is four years. Consult your local congressman for further information, or write to the Superintendent of the U. S. Military Academy, West Point, N. Y.

J. McG., Lennox, S. D.—It requires more than three boys to organize a troop of Boy Scouts. For all the information you wish, write to the National Headquarters, Boy Scouts of America, 200 Fifth Ave., New York City.

Mrs. F. F., Cheyenne, Wyo.—Practically all of the pearls that are often found when eating oysters have little or no value. You live in a fair-sized city; why not ask one of your local jewelers concerning this oyster trophy?

H. E. O., Ingram, Tex.—Write to the Bureau of Navigation, Washington, D. C., for information concerning becoming a wireless operator in the U. S. Navy. We know of no Radio School in Texas, although it is possible that such exists.

I. M., Biltmore, N. C.—The Panama Canal was opened for navigation on August 15, 1914. It is built across the Isthmus of Panama at its narrowest part but one. The canal has a length of 43.8 nautical miles from deep water in the Atlantic to deep water in the Pacific. The sea level portion of the canal extends from its commencement in Limon Bay to Gatun, a distance of 5.77 miles. At Gatun there are three pairs of locks leading to Gatun Lake, which is 85 feet above sea level. From the lake, the canal extends up the valley of the Chagres for 20.55 miles to Gamboa. It is at Gamboa that the famous Culebra Cut begins. This is about seven miles long and extends to Pedro Migue Lock and dam on the Pacific slope of the canal. Here one lock lowers the passing ship to Miraflores Lake, a small body of water about a mile in length and located 55 feet above sea level. At the south end of this lake are the Miraflores Locks which, in two steps, lowers the vessel to the level of the Pacific. The canal then follows a sea level channel of seven miles, past Balboa, and out into the Pacific Ocean. The minimum channel depth of the Panama Canal is 41 feet and in some places this depth is 80 feet. The Canal Zone is a strip of land which extends for five miles on each side of the canal, but does not include the cities of Panama or Colon, which belong to the Republic of Panama. The United States paid $10,000,000 for the Zone and also agreed to pay $250,000 annually to the Republic of Panama for so long as the Zone was occupied by this country. The cost of the Panama Canal to our government was about $375,000,000.

S. J., Janette, Pa.—We are sorry to shatter any hopes you may have, but we feel very certain that your violin which bears the name of Stradivarius is not a genuine work of that famous craftsman. Existing Strads are practically all known to experts, and some of the instruments are worth from $25,000 up. There is apparently a flourishing business in the making of fraudulent "old violins" which are given false inscriptions to deceive buyers.

Comfort Friend, Cloud Chief, Okla.—There are over eighteen million acres of vacant public lands in the State of Wyoming. This state is a famed sheep-raising section but, as in many others, the ranges are rapidly giving place to general agriculture. In a large part of Wyoming irrigation is needed to make the soil produce, and only in the eastern portion can crops be successfully grown without additional water supply. But there are numerous public and private irrigation projects in operation to furnish water to the thirsty acres, and where this is done fine crops of alfalfa, sugar beets, vegetables and small fruits are being grown. Over a million acres of the state are now irrigated, and systems of dry farming are also in use. Wyoming has a mean elevation of 6,300 feet, and the dry atmosphere and clear sunshine make a healthful climate. There are U. S. Land Offices in the state at Cheyenne, Douglas, Evanston, Lander and Newcastle. You can write to any of these, or all. (2) Colorado, to speak generally, is a state of abundant sunshine, dry atmosphere and light rainfall. Although much of the land in Colorado will always be better suited for grazing than for agricultural uses, yet the cultivated area of this great state increases each year. The eastern portion of the state—once an immense plain devoted entirely to the raising of cattle—is now being gradually developed into a splendid agricultural section. There are 8,251,297 acres of vacant public land in Colorado. There are ten U. S. Land Offices in the state to any one of which you might write. The most important of these offices would be those at Denver and Pueblo. (3) New Mexico has almost 15,000,000 acres of vacant public lands and the principal U. S. Land Offices in the state are at Santa Fe and Roswell. The state is largely arid and its general surface is high plateaus, traversed by mountain ranges. The valleys are mostly level and their soil fertile. The climate is the driest in the United States. Yet when sufficient water can be had, the soil shows wonderful fertility. There are now extensive irrigation projects on the Pecos, Rio Grande, and other large rivers. Much of New Mexico has sufficient rainfall to be classed as "dry farming" land. We think the southeastern portion of the state to be least desirable for homesteading purposes. In some parts of New Mexico today all the various grains and vegetables are produced, and during late years a considerable fruit-raising industry has been developed.

The Modern Farmer

lime-sulphur spray can be used at this time without danger of having a residue of poison remain on leaves. (4) Our experience has not brought us in touch with the general rotting of near-ripe tomatoes such as you describe, though we have known it to occur quite extensively in wet seasons on poorly drained land. We cannot think of any disease that would act in this way. Perhaps it is something that is common only to your locality. In this case we advise that you get in touch at once with your State Agricultural Experiment Station, giving full particulars.

Roses Refuse to Bloom.—Please tell me why everblooming roses don't bloom in this limestone region. I have everbloomer roses, including everbloomer rambler, also calla lily, and none of them ever blooms.
Mrs. A. G., Maxwelton, W. Va.

A.—Perhaps your roses refuse to bloom because of the excessive amounts of limestone in the soil. It would be well to make a separate bed for these roses. Get rich, loamy black soil from the woods, add well-rotted barnyard manure and good, clean sand, using one part of each, and compost them after thorough mixing. Dig out the new bed to a depth of 8 inches and fill in with the composted mixture. Transplant the roses to this bed. If the excess of lime in the soil has been the cause of their refusing to bloom, this trouble will be overcome in this way.

Five One-Year Old ROSE BUSHES

HERE is the offer you have been waiting for—our new 1922 offer of beautiful Rose bushes free to all COMFORT readers. This year we shall give you what we believe to be five of the finest varieties yet produced. They come from the most famous rose grower in the United States—an expert who has done nothing but cutivate roses all his life. Each bush is one year old and in a growing condition when delivered to you. No matter where you live, you will receive the bushes at the proper time to plant in your locality. We guarantee that they will reach you in perfect condition. If they do not, or if any of the bushes fail to grow, we will replace them for you free of all cost. Following is a brief description of each of the five different varieties. Please read carefully—and send in your order today.

For One Subscription You Get These Five Prize Beauties!

Alexander Hill Grey A magnificent giant yellow rose, standing head and shoulders above all others of its color, ranking with the American Beauty and the Killarneys in value and grandeur. The color is a deep golden yellow with the edge of the petal a little lighter.

Columbia A very large Rose, the open flower measuring six inches across. The color is a true pink, deepening as it opens to a glowing pink. The shades become more and more intenso until the full maturity of the flower is reached, and this color is enduring.

Lady Gay One of the most wonderful of all climbing roses, noted for its sweet and lasting fragranc) and immense clusters of double, light pink blossoms—as many as thirty to forty in a single cluster. It has none of the defects of the Rambler but remains free from disease in all climates.

Eugene E. Marlitt One of the finest garden roses, healthy, vigorous and free blooming. The flowers are large and very double and of a rich bright carmine with scarlet tones which do not fade in the hottest weather. It is very hardy, fragrant and keeps up a close succession of bloom.

Bessie Brown A splendid new rose introduced here from Europe and beautiful beyond comparison. It bears large, full, double blossoms on strong, erect stems, is very hardy and fragrant, blooming profusely all through the summer. The color is almost pure white, flushed with pink.

Our Free Offer For only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50c we will send you the above described five Rose Bushes, free by parcel post prepaid. They will be forwarded to you at the proper time for planting in your locality and we guarantee they will reach you in perfect condition. Reward 8661.

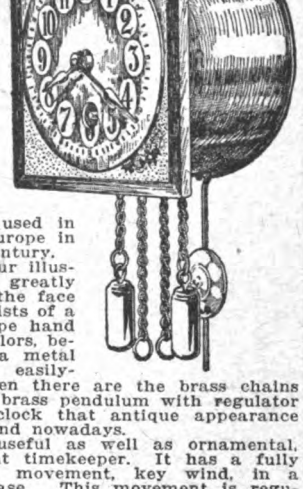
She Is Looking For A Mother "Peggy" The New Summer Doll Do You Want Her?

PEGGY first saw the light of day in New York but she didn't like the big city with its noise and confusion and was mighty glad to come to Maine on a brief vacation before looking for a permanent home somewhere in the country.

She doesn't care where she lives so long as as it is in some cozy little town or on a nice, big farm, and provided she can find some little girl who will be a kind mother to her. She just loves the horses and cows and doggies and kitties and—yes, even the little "piggies" make her laugh until she can hardly stand up.



Peggy says that life on the farm is the only life for her, so we want to give her to some little girl who lives on a farm, where she can romp and play to her heart's content and be happy all day long. Please remember, however, that we have but a limited number of these Dolls on hand and if you want one your order should be sent in at once.

A New York manufacturer who wanted to keep his help busy during the dull season sold us these Dolls at about one-half the regular wholesale price, so we are enabled to give them away for almost nothing.

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you "Peggy" free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8621.

Antique Wall Clock Hand Colored Face

Reward No. 8194.

For A Club Of Four

If you like things unique, you will be charmed with this novelty clock which is very similar in design to those used in some parts of Europe in the Eighteenth Century.

As shown in our illustration, which is greatly reduced in size, the face of the clock consists of a beautiful landscape hand painted in four colors, beneath which is a metal dial with large, easily-read figures. Then there are the brass chains and weights and brass pendulum with regulator which give the clock that antique appearance so much in demand nowadays.

This clock is useful as well as ornamental, being an excellent timekeeper. It has a fully guaranteed brass movement, key wind, in a polished nickel case. This movement is regulated by the disk on the pendulum which is easily adjusted to make the clock run faster or slower as desired. A hanger attached to the back of the clock enables one to hang it on any desirable location on the wall.

We were so sure that our club raisers would be pleased with this clock we had a large quantity imported for us at a special low price. We are now giving them away free on the terms of the following special offer.

Given To You! For a club of four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each, we will send you this unique novelty clock exactly as illustrated and described free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8194.

It's Nerve Force from Nuxated Iron that helps make STRONG, MAGNETIC, FORCEFUL MEN, who make their over-mastering presence felt the moment they enter a room.

NUXATED IRON contains the principal chemical constituent of active living nerve force in a form which most nearly resembles that in the brain and nerve cells of man. It also contains organic iron like the iron in your blood and like the iron in spinach, lentils and apples. Organic iron enriches the blood and plenty of rich red blood means more nerve force, so that Nuxated Iron not only feeds what might be termed artificial nerve force to the nerve cells, but it stimulates the blood to manufacture a greatly increased supply of new nerve force. If you are weak, nervous or run-down, get a bottle of Nuxated Iron today, and if within two weeks' time you do not feel that it has increased your nerve force and made you feel better and stronger in every way, your money will be refunded. Sold by all druggists.

and all our blessings. If I have written something to cause comment, remember this:

"Not understood, we gather false impressions,
And hug them closer as the years go by,
Till often virtues seem to us transgressions,
And thus man rises, falls and lives and dies,
Not understood."

Just one thing more and I will close. There is no bitterness so hard to overcome as that which springs from unjust censure by our friends, no pain that cuts so deep as the keen shock of careless blame from lips of those whose very thoughts were dear to us. No hopelessness so desperate as finding those to whom we bared our souls, held no real faith, no true belief in us, their once beloved.

MRS. FLORA ESTES.

BROWNSVILLE, KY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have read COMFORT ever since I have known how to read and have gained valuable help thereby. Especially do I enjoy the Sisters' Corner and Crumbs of COMFORT.

To Contented Wife, of North Carolina, I have taught school for four years and find that children who wait till they are seven to start school, learn much better than those who start at five and six. Last year while teaching I had a little girl eight years old. She had never been to school before and by the end of four months she had reached the fourth grade. I have also had children start school at the age of five and not complete the first grade during the whole term.

I live near the Mammoth and Onyx Caves. I am twenty-two years old, unmarried and would be glad to receive letters from any who care to write.

Best wishes to all. ELVA HAWKINS.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

To keep sheet corners from whipping out in the wind, stitch four or five rows diagonally across the hem.—MRS. FRED PAGE, Battle Ground, Ind.

When washing, add a little kerosene, a tablespoonful is enough, and see how much whiter the clothes will be.—MRS. GLADYS PRETTYWOOD, Warland, Mont.

When screws become loose, remove and make a wooden peg to fit the screw hole. Cover with glue and drive in to depth of hole and cut off smooth. Let glue harden, then put screw back and it will fit tightly. A hole a little smaller than the screw, made with a nail, will make it easier to put in.—PORSEY, Pattonsburg, Mo.

A tried cement for stove is made of equal parts of wood ashes and table salt reduced to a paste with cold water. Fill the cracked place with this paste when stove is cold and it will soon harden.

Camphor placed in trunks or drawers will prevent mice from doing injury.

Use sewing silk when basting velvet and when removed there will be no trace of the stitches. Cotton thread is not as satisfactory.

If you want gingham to hold its color, try this: To one gallon of water, add one pint of vinegar and one pint of salt. Soak cloth in this.—DELLE LILLY, Odd, W. Va.

When taking epsom salts, first take a swallow of buttermilk, then the salts, and another swallow of buttermilk. There is no disagreeable taste in the mouth then.

Put cardboard in shoes that have cheap inner soles. Replace as it wears out.

To cook an egg when you have no fire, put a little butter in a tin pie pan and break an egg in it. Hold this over lighted lamp and the egg will soon cook. —EVA, Hegira, Ky.

When sewing buttons on heavy clothing, lay a pin across the button and sew it over. This keeps the button from being so near the cloth and it stays on longer and buttons easier.

Use a fine crochet hook to pull thread through picots in making tatting.

When crocheting, keep a small safety pin handy and when you lay your work down catch in the stitch and snap together. This prevents raveling.—MRS. BEN F. FAGAN, Martin, Ga.

Remedies

SUMMER COMPLAINT.—Make a strong tea of cinnamon bark and give in tablespoon doses, in milk preferably.—MRS. MARIA J. KNOWLTON, Eureka, Cal.

RATTLESNAKE BITE.—Beat the yolk of an egg, add enough salt to make a poultice and apply this at fifteen-minute intervals for two hours. This is an old Indian remedy.—MRS. PHILIP S. LEATH, Gallatin, Tex.

BURNS.—Mix enough baking soda with vaseline to make a soft paste and apply to burn, being careful not to break the skin.—MRS. M. C. MCNABB, Terrell, Texas.

RATTLESNAKE BITE.—Tie a bandage tightly above and below the bite; if possible, make tiny incision or cut out a tiny piece of flesh at point of bite, and squeeze. Pulverize a good pinch of permanganate of potassium and apply. Two applications will draw poison from flesh of man or beast. Turpentine and soda are also good. Bind soda over bite and pour turpentine over soda. Repeat as soon as soda turns green.—MRS. GEORGIA BIERMAN, Dixon, Mont.

Sisters' Circle Pin

Free! EVERY COMFORT Sister should wear this beautiful Sisters' Circle Brooch Pin—the one and only official Sisters' "badge" of membership, uniting in one grand Circle of friendship and love the thousands of COMFORT Sisters living in all parts of the world. It is the size of a 25-cent piece, gold finished, and the front is inlaid with handsome cloisonne enamel in two colors—your choice of red or blue—with the words "COMFORT Sisters" deeply embossed, as shown in the illustration.

If you are a COMFORT Sister, send us only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50c and we will send you a Sisters' Circle Pin free and prepaid. Or, if you prefer, you may send 50c to pay for a one-year renewal (not your own), and we will send you the Pin free. Be sure to mention color wanted. Reward No. 8671.

FOR LADIES ONLY
$2,500.00 IN PRIZES

You Can Win $1,000.00 If You Make Up a List of The Objects In This Picture Beginning With "P"—Like "Post," "Paper," etc.

IT'S EASY TO WIN

For every object is right there—plain as day. You cannot miss one; for none are hidden. Just glance at the picture and "P"—word objects will instantly begin to dance before your eyes.

IT COSTS YOU NOTHING TO TRY

And the fifty answers that are nearest correct will be awarded the 50 PRIZES as shown below. So get out your pencil and write down the names of the things you see in this picture beginning with the letter "P," AND WIN FIRST PRIZE.

Greatest Opportunity Ever Offered Ladies EXCLUSIVELY

This is an exclusive ladies' Cash Prize Distribution to get them acquainted with our new "Wonder" Convertible Purse.

You need not buy a thing to win—just so you are a female; maid or matron, you may try for the prizes. And we want every lady, single and married, young and old, all to take part in this game of fun and profit.

50 PRIZES

Now on Deposit in The Wabash National Bank, St. Paul.

To Advertise New "Wonder" Convertible Purse

We want every woman and girl in America to know of the many advantages of our New "Wonder" Convertible Purse pictured here in its three different adjustments. Appeals to women of most refined taste. Can be changed to a Boston Bag and also to a Carry-all Shopping Bag. Comes in dark brown alligator finish, and is made only of highest grade Elkhide. Strong and durable. This new purse cannot be found elsewhere, for it is patented, and we ship direct from our factory. The Cash Prizes we are giving away are to help introduce our new Purse. That's why The Largest Prizes will be awarded to those who answer the puzzle and order a "Wonder" Purse, price $5.00. You'll say it's the most beautiful purse you've ever seen.

How To Win $1,000.00

You do not have to buy a "Wonder" Purse to win a prize. But if you do not purchase one and the judges decide your answer is the nearest correct, you will win only $25.00. However, as this advertising campaign is to introduce our new "Wonder" Convertible Purse in as many homes as possible, the following big Cash Prize offer is made:

If your answer is adjudged the nearest correct, and you have purchased a "Wonder" Purse, price $5.00, you will win the first prize of $1,000.00 CASH. (See Class "A" Gifts in Prize List Above.)

Dept. 20, ST. PAUL, MINN.

OBSERVE THESE RULES

1. Any woman or girl in the U. S. may submit an answer, except those who live in St. Paul and employees of this company or their relatives.
2. Whoever sends in the answer having the largest number of words which correctly name objects in the picture beginning with "P" will win first prize, and so on down the list of 50 prizes. In case of tie, the prize tied for will be awarded each tying contestant.
3. Use only English words. Those of the same spelling but different meaning or synonymous words will count only once. It is permissible to use either singular or plural, but not both. An object can be named only once, but any part of an object may also be named. Answers must not include hyphenated, obsolete, compound, foreign or words inapplicable to the picture—which if included will be counted as demerits. Webster's international dictionary will be the authority.
4. Write "P" words on one side of paper only, numbering each word 1, 2, 3, 4, etc. If the picture is not clearly printed in this paper, write us and we will gladly send you a larger and clearer picture. Be sure to write your full name and address at top of each sheet.
5. Three prominent St. Paul people have consented to act as judges: J. M. Clancy, Chairman of St. Paul City Council; Jennie T. Cobler, Public School Teacher, and P. M. Reagan, President, Wabash National Bank. Their decisions must be accepted as final and conclusive.
6. Your answer must be mailed and postmarked not later than June 3, 1922. The judges meet two weeks later to award the prizes. The names of the winners and the winning list of words will be published and mailed to persons who order a "Wonder" Purse.

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

MISS J. H., Houlton, Maine.—Living on green vegetables, the avoidance of sweets and pastries of all kinds, keeping the bowels free at all times, and, with salads, adding a lot of olive oil, will in the main be the best diet and regimen for one liable to gallstones. Of course one must avoid so-called hard drinking water, and, if possible, drink only rain water or waters that are fairly soft.

MRS. J. W. H., Moquoh, Wisc.—You should avoid eating too heartily and keep your bowels free at all times. You have, no doubt, a nervous dyspepsia, and if you will take a five-grain pill of asafœtida after meals, you will get rid of the trouble mentioned.

MRS. J. E. C., Dozier, Ala.—Probably a neuritis of the leg. Have your mother take a five-grain tablet of salicylate of soda four times a day. Also steam the leg by applying hot cloths and using a hot iron.

MISS C. M. A., Higginsville, Mo.—A sty is usually due to the need of lenses. If you have a sty, apply a hot lotion of boric acid to the eye.

MISS H. M., Mt. Pleasant, Texas.—The only way to remove superfluous hair is by use of the electric needle. The lotions mentioned will not injure the face neither will they do the face any good or the condition mentioned.

MR. L. C. R., Elkins, West Va.—Nocturnal urination does not have any relation to kidney disease necessarily. Take a five-grain tablet of urotropin after meals and see if you are not benefited.

MRS. J. A., Flourmoy, Cal.—Have the uterine ulcerations cauterized and treated. For your nervousness take a five-grain tablet of asafœtida after meals.

MRS. H. D., Dogden, N. Dak.—If the breasts have no lumps or growths in them let them alone and they will come around all right. If, however, they have lumps in them, have them removed at once. Your husband can take five-grain pills of asafœtida after meals for his nervousness. You better have his urine examined and ascertain the true condition of his kidneys.

MRS. U. A. E., Greeley, Colo.—Simply a nervous condition. Take a five-grain tablet of asafœtida after meals and the nervous heart action will disappear.

MRS. A. D., Dufur, Oregon.—Mild epilepsy is the trouble. Keep the boy's bowels free at all times, have him avoid eating too much food at one time, and have him also take five-grain tablets of bromide of sodium after meals.

MRS. C. H., Waynesburg, Pa.—Have all of your children take a prolonged nap in the afternoon and eat a very simple supper at night. This prolonged nap will lead up to a less profound sleep at night and, no doubt, the children will wake up when they desire to urinate. You can reduce your flesh by living on one quart of skimmed milk on alternate days and, on the other days, avoiding sweets of all kinds as well as pastries. You must also take regular exercise in the open air daily.

MISS A. P., Bergland, Mich.—You may have an ulcer of the stomach; in that case you should live on peptonized milk only, drinking about a quart of the milk during the day. Keep your bowels open by using one or two cascara sagrada pills at night. Avoid sweets of all kinds.

MRS. E. S. SNOWBALL, Ark.—You may have a catarrhal condition of the bronchial tubes. Take a teaspoonful of the following mixture: Ammonium iodide, grains eight; Fowler's solution, thirty drops; syrup of tolu, one ounce and water to make two ounces. A teaspoonful after meals and at bedtime will no doubt cure your bronchitis, and clear up the mucous as well.

MRS. S. H., Rotan, Texas.—The "dark looks" or discoloration under the eyes is undoubtedly due to a run-down condition. Wean the baby and take, after meals, a tablespoonful of Basham's mixture well diluted.

Seven Wheel Chairs in April

640 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The Wheel-Chair Club has made a fine showing the past month. The seven April wheel chairs go to Mrs. S. B. Gonning, R. F. D. 4, Bristol, Tenn., 155; Alvid Tedford, Greenwood, Ark., 82; Archie V. Matheson, R. 3, Box 24, Stony Point, N. C., 71; Herman Rodgers, Maxville, Ark., 71; Velma Irene Hough, Russ, Mo., 57; Clarence W. Tutherow, R. 2, Box

MRS. CATHERINE FRAISURE ENJOYS HER COMFORT WHEEL CHAIR.

51, Lincolnton, N. C., 56; Conley Joyner, R. 2, Box 90, Judsonia, Ark., 54. The figures following their respective names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them.

Mrs. S. B. Gonning, age 47, is so crippled by rheumatism that she can not stand and is almost helpless. She is a widow with five children, one of them a cripple. The family is supported by the eldest daughter, who teaches school, and a son too young to earn a man's wages. The wheel chair will be a blessing to Mrs. Gonning and a great help to her younger daughter in caring for her.

Alvid Tedford, age 12, is badly crippled by rheumatism and for the past eighteen months has been unable to walk. He lives with his grandparents.

Archie V. Matheson, age 43, is crippled by rheumatism so that he has not been able to walk for more than two years. For support he is dependent on his wife and such of his four children as are able to work.

Herman Rodgers, age 12, has been crippled from early childhood and is unable to walk.

Velma Irene Hough, age 6, has no use of her lower limbs. When about a year old and just learning to walk she was taken sick with a disease, the nature of which has not been determined. It left her legs permanently affected and they have never developed as they should. She is a bright child and the wheel chair will be a joy to her and a help to her mother in caring for her.

Clarence W. Tutherow, age 10, has been a cripple from birth and never able to walk, but has full use of his hands.

Conley Joyner, age 28, has suffered severely from rheumatism the past three years and is now so crippled that he can not walk and has little or no use of his left arm. He has a wife and two boys, two and four years of age respectively.

It is now the season when the shut-ins, like the rest of humanity, are most desirous for the fresh air and sunshine. Do your best this month to help provide them with wheel chairs to enable them to get out of doors and enjoy the springtime and summer.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT,
Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled,

I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscriptions, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Has Been Enjoying Her Wheel Chair Over Three Years

Lulu, Florida,

Dear Mr. Gannett:

Here is a picture of myself enjoying my wheel chair as I have for over three years past, but only just now have got around to have this picture made to put in dear old COMFORT. The picture is not very good but I would like to see it in COMFORT. Again I wish to thank you and all others who helped me to get my wheel chair. Sincerely yours, (Mrs.) Catherine Fraisure.

Backward Children

Backward children are not always, perhaps not often, backward because of either mental deficiency or slothfulness, says the U. S. Public Health Service. Many of them are backward solely because of such ordinary and easily remediable defects as adenoids, near-sightedness, or bad teeth.

A case in point was recently reported by the official representative of the Public Health Service in the eighth sanitary district of Vermont, in which the Service is cooperating in a rural health work project.

Medical inspection of one of the graded schools in October, 1919, showed that it had been thought necessary to instruct in a special room sixteen pupils who had seemed to be unable to keep up with their respective classes. Physical examination showed that each of the sixteen had some serious hampering physical defect (chiefly enlarged tonsils, adenoids, or defective hearing or eyesight) which rather than any mental handicap, was the probable cause of their inability.

Through the cooperation of the school directors, the facts were brought to the attention of the parents or guardians of the children and all were set right before the end of the year.

On re-examination of the pupils the next December (1920) it appeared that all the sixteen previously backward children had caught up with their proper grades and were keeping up in them with their classmates. A year later, in December, 1921, some of these sixteen children were among the mental and physical leaders in their grades.

Women Should Be Exempt from the Hardship and Indelicacy Necessarily Involved in Jury Service

IF the majority of thinking people in this country have failed to perceive that the protagonists for "equal rights" for both sexes are pushing their legislative efforts to pernicious extremes in some directions, notably in that of subjecting women to jury service, probably the public's lack of discernment, especially in regard to the latter movement, is because the discordant relation of the proposition to the eternal fitness of things has not been presented in the light of reason and common sense, but rather camouflaged by specious arguments and grandiloquent appeals to sentiment. Perhaps a few startling instances illustrative of the practical workings of the "mixed jury" system in States that have recently adopted this legal innovation may serve to draw attention to certain overlooked or unappreciated phases of the question and help to demonstrate the inherent impropriety of extending the duty of jury service to women on terms that are indiscriminate as to sex.

Woman Juror Says Jury Service Is Unfit for Women

Judge Marshall, while presiding over a session of the Court of Common Pleas at Trenton, New Jersey, last March, excused Mrs. Anna Cunningham from further jury service, at her request, after being informed that her experience as a member of two mixed juries (composed of both sexes) within a week had convinced her that women are not fitted for such duty. It is not an infrequent occurrence for a jury, if divided in opinion or slow in deciding a case, to be locked up in the jury room for all-night deliberation, all members being herded together within while a court officer stands guard outside the locked door. This happened to one of the juries on which Mrs. Cunningham served, and she afterwards declared that the strain of this all-night conclave with the male members brought her to the verge of nervous prostration, and that at the time she was interviewed she had not recovered from the effects. In confirmation of her views her husband said: "The present illness of Mrs. Cunningham is the first at all serious in 16 years. I attribute it solely to the mental and nervous strain to which she has been subjected."

Among the numerous reasons cited by Mrs. Cunningham for her reluctance further to participate in the administration of justice she specified her five children and husband. She added: "In a sense, I also consider that jury service is an assault upon the woman's natural modesty, refinement and reserve. Some cases which she is called upon to consider are of a nature so delicate that she shrinks from a frank discussion of the evidence, and yet a just verdict is impossible otherwise. I am speaking for the first time since I began service as a juror, and do so now only that other women may know what to expect if they accept the obligation."

Shocking Ordeal of Women Jurors

Mrs. Josephine Brown, one of seven women jurors who through two days and two nights were confined with the five male members of the jury while considering the case of an automobile thief, prefaced her account of their experience by remarking that "the shocking details are just coming to light." Beds were provided, but the women and men had to sleep in the same room. We briefly summarize her story: "The first night we just sat around on the edges of the beds and talked about the case until we were nearly dead, then crawled into bed but the women did not sleep much. Though one women talked all night the men didn't lose any sleep, judging from the snoring. Long before daylight we were up and dressed while the men were still snoring. The second night was a repetition of the first, except that the men turned in early, being worn out with arguments, and left the women to their own devices." This happened in Saint Paul, and the storm of indignation raised by the husbands of these women was intensified when Governor Preuse, of Minnesota, siding with them, declared: "Never would I allow Mrs. Preuse to go through such an ordeal."

Although it is deemed essential to the ends of justice that the members of a jury be kept together and safeguarded from possibility of outside influence from the time the trial closes with the judge's instructions until they render a verdict or are discharged because of being unable to agree, it is possible that our jury rooms might be fitted with conveniences to mitigate in some degree the inconveniences suffered by mixed juries. Nevertheless the main objections (so clearly stated by Mrs. Cunningham) to women being closeted with men to discuss indelicate details of a case are fundamental and cannot be obviated.

Jury service should be classed with military service, not as a privilege but a burdensome duty to be performed by those only who are fit. Not all male citizens are subject to jury service; those that are unfit are excluded; those engaged in professions or employments necessary to the public service or the well-being of the community, such as Federal and State officials, physicians, school teachers, clergymen and others whose duties are deemed more important than those of jurors, are exempt from jury service. The burden of motherhood and the supernal duties of "uncrowned queen" of the home imposed on woman by Divine Providence, and due regard for that natural modesty which is the shield of her purity, each and all demand that she be exempt from jury service. If must be that, to satisfy the demands of some adventurous women who crave the experience of serving on a mixed jury, the law is to be changed to make them eligible it should be with a proviso that no woman's name shall be listed for jury duty without her previous written consent. It is proverbial among lawyers and in the courts that women litigants have a distinct advantage over men litigants at the hands of a male jury, which they would lose if tried by a mixed or female jury. The lawyer who defended a woman recently tried for murder of her husband refused to allow any of the women jurors to sit in judgment of his client; she was tried and acquitted by a jury of men. The women should look into and take action on the mixed jury proposition.

Our New Radiophone Department

THROUGH our new department entitled "Radio Flashes", which begins in this issue, COMFORT is prepared to serve and instruct its readers in the most recently developed field of applied science, the construction, operation and use of the wireless telephone, otherwise known as the radiophone. It is but little more than five years since the original inventor succeeded in devising the first apparatus capable of reproducing sound at a distance without wire connection between the sending mechanism and the receiving instrument. It was a very crude, imperfect contrivance but it did the trick and, even though its effective radius was small compared with the great distances covered by the present-day radiophone, foreshadowed to the vision of imaginative experimenters wonderful possibilities many of which have already been achieved through a rapid progression of discoveries and improvements. And the end is not in sight, for scientists tell us that the wireless telephone is in its infancy in development as well as in age.

Until about a year ago the radiophone amounted to but little more than a scientific toy. But during the past twelve months its employment for practical purposes has become so extensive that it is now classed as one of the great public utilities, and the Federal Government has found it necessary to regulate its use in order to secure to the public the most beneficial service of which this new means of communication is capable. Why this regulation of use is essential to good service, indeed to any service all, by radiophone is easily explained. The voice of a speaker is carried to the ears of his audience by air vibrations, called sound waves; but if a number of people in the assembly are talking at the same time the sound waves of their several voices interfere so that none is heard distinctly. If each pair of conversationists should talk to each other through a separate speaking-tube, the sound waves being confined within the tubes, there would be no interference and each speaker would be heard distinctly by his respective listener at the other end of the tube even if at opposite ends of the hall. This illustrates the fundamental difference between telephoning by wireless and telephoning by wire. When you talk by wire it is like conversing through a speaking-tube, for the electric current which reproduces your voice through the receiver at the other end is confined to the wire, and only those who have phones on the line you are using can hear or break in on you. But when you talk by wireless telephone (radiophone), transmission is accomplished by means of electro-magnetic waves which travel (like sound waves, but infinitely faster and farther) in every direction through the air, so that any one or any number of persons anywhere within the immense area covered by these waves, if equipped with a wireless receiving apparatus, can listen in; consequently there cannot be any privacy in radiophone communication. Also if two or more persons within radio range of one another are sending out conversation or music at the same time the electro-magnetic transmission waves from the several senders will interfere and no one will be able to catch the sounds distinctly. Hence the necessity for Government regulation of radiophone sending.

There is no regulation or restriction of the use of radiophone receivers; anyone is at liberty to listen in and catch as much as he likes of the radio talk and music that are flying through the air, and there are no tolls to pay for the service. But all radiophone sending stations have to be licensed and can be operated only at such times and under such conditions as are prescribed to prevent interference with the Government service as well as with one another. By using different wave lengths for transmission a limited number of radiophone sending stations can operate in the same area at the same time without interference, and the owner of a receiver, by adjusting his instrument, can switch from one to another so as to listen in as he likes on any one of these senders. The Government distributes daily by radiophone a variety of useful information, and radiophone sending stations in most of the large cities every evening broadcast lectures, speeches, bedtime stories and vocal and instrumental music including concerts by famous orchestras, so that the owner of a receiving set, in any part of the country, and his family and guests can listen to a delightful entertainment any evening, as many thousands do. Many people in the cities are enjoying this privilege, but it is the folks in the small towns and villages and especially in the farm homes that derive the most benefit from the radiophone when and wherever they avail themselves of its wonderful service. The experience of a boy on a Kansas farm, as told in the Kansas Farmer, is a good illustration. He said, in part:

"We have been using a radiophone receiving set for about a year and have been regularly receiving market reports, concerts, news items, conversations between operators, reports of stolen automobiles, descriptions of men hunted by the police, and a number of other things. The stations which we can hear best are Pittsburgh, Detroit, Kansas City, Denver, and Madison, Wis. We also hear occasionally from Oak and Wahoo, Neb., Slater, Jefferson City and St. Louis, Mo., Chicago, Ill., Great Bend and Kiowa, Kan. We get the correct time twice a day from Annapolis, Md. The other evening we had guests here at the farm and all of us listened to a splendid concert by a symphony orchestra in Chicago." Every farm home should have a receiving set, and ere long those that do not will be rare.

"EXTRY! Extry! All about Parson Armstrong." Quiet, conservative Plainsburg was astir with excitement. "Heard the news?—Read the Extra?—Foolhardy!—Risking too much!—A brave man, that Armstrong!—A genuine hero!—Wonder the Board of Health allowed it.—He's the preacher for me after this.—Say——" So the story passed from lip to lip.

It was prayer meeting night at the Plainsburg Memorial M. E. church. No sign was needed or blackboard notice to tell passers-by that something of unusual interest was transpiring within that old weather-stained building. It was a common saying among the people of the town that the Methodist church was as dead as a door nail and that, if it were not for the funerals and occasional weddings it might as well close its doors and put up a sign, "For Rent."

The old folks said, when questioned concerning the church's decline: "Our young people today want a stylish preacher and a fine choir and a new church building; they are not satisfied with the old church and the gospel plainly presented and they tell us we're behind the times and that to shout when you get happy is not refined, and so they go around the corner to the Presbyterian church or upon the hill to the new Episcopal church and we are left to bear the burden of a declining church alone."

The young people complained: "The older members of the church are not in sympathy with us. They seem to think that good music is sinful and a polished, well-dressed preacher a disgrace to the pulpit."

So for several years the fight had continued, till the audiences at the regular Sunday services consisted of the preacher, the sexton and fifty or less of the "old guard," while a prayer meeting congregation numbering a dozen was considered as worthy of special mention. No wonder that the strange sight of crowds hurrying toward the Methodist church had roused the quiet community from its long sleep of indifference.

From a vivacious group of young people gathered at the church door came the animated queries: "Have you seen him? Is he married? How old is he? Wonder if he's handsome? Some crowd, Bert——" Silence fell upon the eager chattering company as Brother Parson's old familiar "flivver" drew up at the curb. From it sprang the alert manly figure of the new minister, followed more slowly by the bent form of their old pastor. With a bright smile of greeting and a tip of the soft grey derby, the stranger passed into the church.

"Isn't he a stunner?" observed Bert Foster. "Let's go in and see if he can talk as well as look handsome." Bert Foster was the president of the "West Side Social Club," and as such wielded a powerful influence over the young people of that community. Following his example, a year back, the whole club had bidden farewell to the Methodist church and become "religious tramps," claiming no church as their own.

When the papers first announced the fact that the pastor of the Memorial M. E. church had been forced to retire because of a nervous breakdown (caused by preaching to empty benches, townspeople said) and that a young man was to take his place for the unexpired term, great was the excitement among the former adherents of that church. The club held a special meeting and decided to attend the new preacher's first service in a body, and they unanimously voted: "If he appears to be the right kind of a fellow we'll stand by him and help stir things up at the old church."

As the newly-appointed pastor, the Rev. Gordon Armstrong, passed up the church aisle to his place on the platform, he was conscious of the fact that every eye in that large gathering was focused upon him. He had been told by a not over-wise friend of the unpleasant relations existing between the old and young of the church and he realized that his position was to be no sinecure; nevertheless he was there as shepherd for all the flock and to be true to his trust he must side with neither faction.

As the first hymn was being sung, he had an opportunity of looking over his audience. Down near the main door he noticed a large company of young people and as he heard their full, rich voices swelling out in the old gospel hymn, he made a mental resolve that before many weeks rolled around he'd have a chorus choir that any church might envy. At the close of the service an informal reception was held in order that the new pastor might greet personally the members of his new flock. It seemed a strange working of Providence that as the people gathered around the chancel, Bert Foster and old Brother Simmington (better known as "Old Crusty") should have reached the minister's side together and that the preacher should have extended a hand in greeting to each simultaneously. There they stood, representatives of the two warring factions, united for once. Mr. Armstrong seemed to appreciate the situation for he laughingly whispered: "Let the Blue and the Gray salute."

Although fully cognizant of the fact that he was but filling out an unexpired term, Mr. Armstrong lost no time getting down to work. Brother Parsons, moving to a distant city, left the parsonage open for the new man, and Gordon at once established his mother there and kept "open house" for his parishioners. The swift passing weeks convinced the community that Gordon Armstrong was a round peg for a round hole; a man that any church might point to with pride as "Our Pastor!"

At his suggestion a large chorus choir of young people occupied special seats to the right of the pulpit every Sabbath, and already the fame of its music as luring strangers to the services. Mr. Armstrong was also responsible for the fact that at a special meeting held in the parsonage, the "West Side Social Club" unanimously agreed to change its name to "The Memorial Social Union," and their first "job" was to raise funds to equip a gymnasium which the preacher was anxious to open in the basement of the church.

A strong body and a great heart, combined with a saving sense of humor, made Gordon Armstrong a marked man in the old conservative town. Old and young became his friends and the town clergy of other denominations soon recognized that in the new Methodist incumbent they had found a real brother minister.

His pulpit work showed careful preparation. As one of his ardent admirers confided to a skeptical neighbor: "As a preacher he can't be beat. His gospel messages are full of tenderness and help; simple enough for you and me to understand and yet full of thought profound enough for the most learned professor." Even old Brother Dinsmore, who had fought him bitterly at first because he thought he was too stylish a preacher and too partial to the young folks, paid a formal call upon the district superintendent in the hope of being able to persuade that dignitary to use all his influence with the bishop to have "the young man" returned to them for another year at least.

Aside from his preaching, he had won favor for himself by his pastoral visits. His sick and aged seemed to be his special care, and the life of many a weary "shut-in" had been made the brighter by his cheery smile.

Taking it all in all, Gordon Armstrong, as he sat in his study just six weeks before the opening of "Conference," might well have said to himself, truthfully: "Old fellow, you've made a 'hit,' sure enough! I congratulate you!" But instead of that he sat musing by his study fire, a look of anxiety and almost pain upon his face. A light knock at the closed door roused him from his reverie. "Come in," and almost before the words were spoken a light touch fell on his arm, and looking up he saw his mother bending over him. Pride mingled with anxiety was in her voice and manner as she held over his head a large bunch of crimson American Beauties and laughingly whispered: "Gordon, guess who sent them."

To her surprise there was no light response from her son, and looking at him more closely she noticed the look of pain and worry on his face. "Why, Gordon, my boy, what's the matter? Has anything gone wrong? Tell me about it." "Well, mother," he replied gravely, "read this," and he handed her an opened letter which was lying on his desk. "I've tried so hard to win that family and I've failed. I really believe Elsa and Myra would attend our church if Mrs. Livingstone were not so bitter. I can't understand why she insists upon making me suffer for the sins of my predecessor, and I believe he was innocent of the charges she makes against him. Well, I don't think that I'll send her her "letter" tonight. I'll make one more attempt to win her. I'll call there tomorrow." By the way, mother, you must be a little more careful about your visits to the sick now. Dr. Smythe called up this afternoon and told me that the little Anderson boy I called to see over on the East Side last week has the smallpox, and the doctor further said that he was afraid that we were going to have a regular epidemic of it in town. They've turned that old frame building out on Forest Hill into an emergency hospital and they've taken little Harry there. Now, mother, to change the subject suddenly, for I don't want to make you blue, what about the flowers? Who did send them? 'Fessup! Tell me, you know I'm no good at guessing. No, I'm not blushing—I'm too old for that—but really I'm quite curious to find out who sends those beautiful flowers here every Saturday evening. It's strange, too, how you or Ellen always mislay the accompanying card. Did you lose it, this time?"

With a strange smile on her face, Mrs. Armstrong handed him the flowers and two tiny cards —"Mrs. John Steacy"—"Miss Steacy"—and then quietly left the room. A frown gathered on the young man's face as he read the names on the bits of fashionable cardboard. Mildred Steacy was his thorn in the flesh. Wealthy, talented, beautiful; what more could any sensible man ask? In the parlance of her social world, she was a "great catch," but to Gordon Armstrong her triple attractions appealed not at all. They had met for the first time at a reception given in his honor by Prof. Errickson, the president of his board of trustees. It seemed to be a case of love at first sight on her part and cool indifference on his. A few moments' conversation with her had convinced him that the beautiful casket contained but a sham jewel. A society girl, petted and spoiled; her sudden interest in religious matters caused much wonder and speculation. To the surprise of everyone, the fastidious Mildred became a weekly visitor to the poor and needy of the town.

Clad in a perfect-fitting tailor-made gown, with her basket of jellies, and flowers from her home conservatory, she made a beautiful picture of Lady Bountiful as, seated in her electric sedan or yellow roadster, she would whirl up to the parsonage to consult with the dear pastor about the needy sick.

At first he had accepted her proffered help gladly, for her flowers and her bright presence were both very welcome in the homes of the sick, but after a time he began to realize that people were talking. After that he sent to her home each week a list of the sick where her help would be appreciated, and then, strange to say, her interest in the work began to lessen, till, one day, there came to him a tiny perfumed note:

"MY DEAR MR. ARMSTRONG:
"Owing to a press of social duties I shall be compelled to give up my regular work among the sick. My roadster, however, is at your disposal whenever you care to use it. Come and see us.
"Cordially yours,
"MILDRED STEACY."

In response to her invitation he had called several times only to be strengthened in his first opinion that, beautiful and talented though she was, there were lacking in her the essential characteristics of a true "home maker." The family did not belong to the Memorial church so he felt free to act as his head and heart both dictated in the matter.

Almost a month had elapsed since his last call at "The Poplars" and he had about decided not to call again when an invitation arrived for his mother and himself to attend a "Rose Fete" to be given by Mr. and Mrs. John Steacy for their daughter Mildred. After much urging on the part of his mother (who would gladly have welcomed Mildred to her heart and home as Gordon's wife) he had accepted the invitation.

Never had Mildred looked more beautiful—bewitchingly beautiful—than that night as she stood by her mother's side, welcoming the guests. Dressed in shimmering white, a wreath of crimson buds on her queenly head, a single American Beauty nestling in the lace of her bosom, she made a picture of rare loveliness. Even Gordon Armstrong fell a victim to her charms as she bade him welcome to her "Garden of Roses."

The great reception hall and parlors had been transformed so as to represent a rose garden. The color scheme, crimson and green, was carried out to perfection; even the electric lights shone out from the hearts of large crimson roses. Hidden by a lattice of climbing roses, at one end of the reception hall an orchestra discoursed sweet, dreamy music. This, combined with the weird effect of the rose-shaded lights, made one feel as if a magic wand had transplanted them into a bit of fairyland.

As souvenirs of the occasion, Mildred gave to each guest, as they bade her good night, a tiny crimson rosebud. What sudden impulse caused Gordon Armstrong to whisper, "May I have this one?" touching lightly the full-blown flower which Mildred had worn all the evening, he never knew but he regretted his action almost before the words had left his lips; and when, later, alone in his study, he took the flower from the lapel of his coat, he said to himself reprovingly: "Gordon Armstrong, you've done wrong. It isn't fair to the girl. Stop!"

The following Saturday evening while busy running over his sermons for the next day, the maid handed in a bunch of exquisite American Beauty roses. In response to his inquiry concerning the donor, Ellen replied that the card was torn off. His mother, on being questioned, seemed no better informed concerning the matter, and so the flowers were placed in a vase on his desk. After this had happened three or four consecutive Saturday evenings he became annoyed and suspicious, and insisted that his mother could, if she would, tell him who was sending the flowers, and he told her very positively that if they came again without a card, he would not receive them.

It did not come as a great surprise to Gordon as he read the names of the parties who were responsible for the weekly gift—from the very first he had suspected that Mildred Steacy was back of the gift.

A look of sadness chased from his face the frown of displeasure as he gathered together the beautiful blossoms and joined his mother in the drawing-room.

"Mother," he said very gently but positively, "this must stop! I will not receive them again. If they continue to come you must write Mrs. Steacy a note of thanks for your flowers. You meant it for kindness but you did wrong in concealing from me the names of the senders. I fear you have put me in a false position with Miss Steacy. I regret it very greatly."

"Oh, Gordon," cried his mother, "I did it for your good. I was afraid you wouldn't receive the flowers if once you saw the cards and so I destroyed them—but I'm so sorry I've displeased you. Forgive me and I'll do my best to straighten out the tangle."

"Well, never mind, my little diplomatic mother, we won't worry over the matter. Let's go over to the church and see how the choir rehearsal under the new leader is progressing."

The week which followed was a busy one for there was much to be done before "Conference," especially so as he wanted to leave the charge, in the matter of records, in first-class condition for fear he might not be returned as its pastor.

Every day he planned to call at the Livingstones in reference to Mrs. Livingstone's letter, but every day something happened to prevent him from doing as he had intended.

Friday afternoon Dr. Smythe met him on the street and asked him if he had heard of the illness of Elsa and Myra Livingstone. On replying that he had not, the doctor said, "I was sent for Wednesday night to see Myra, and yesterday when I called I found Elsa sick. The symptoms point to a very severe attack of grip. I hope it will not prove to be anything more serious. No one is allowed to see them so there is no use of you calling there. I'm on my way there now."

That same evening as Mr. Armstrong and his mother were at dinner the phone bell rang. In answer to his "Helloa," Gordon was shocked to hear Dr. Smythe say: "Have just sent Myra and Elsa Livingstone to the Emergency hospital suffering with smallpox. It's a terrible thing. The poor mother is almost frantic. She is under quarantine so none of her friends can go to her. I very much fear that Elsa will die."

Gordon was so overcome that he could scarcely tell the dreadful news to his mother. "It seems too sad to be true that those two girls should be stricken down in all their beauty by that most loathsome of all diseases."

"Oh," cried Mrs. Armstrong, "how I wish I could go to that poor mother tonight. She must be almost crazy."

On the following Sunday the chief topic of conversation was the smallpox epidemic and the sad condition of the Livingstone girls. Dr. Smythe said: "The report concerning the girls which I received from the hospital this morning was very discouraging. Both girls are in a serious condition but for Elsa they have little hope of recovery."

The picture painted in such dark colors was too pitiful to contemplate. "Necessarily deserted by family and friends—suffering and perhaps dying without anyone to say a word of comfort or cheer—dark, indeed is their hour of trial; but how can I help them?" mused Mr. Armstrong sadly.

The passing of the days only served to increase the horror of the situation——"Elsa is dying," phoned Dr. Smythe.

Thursday night the Memorial church was packed to the doors with an enthusiastic crowd of Christian Endeavorers. It was a great union meeting of all the societies of the town. On the platform were the pastors and C. E. officials from the various churches. The main address of the evening by the Rev. Gordon Armstrong was ended and the beautiful consecration hymn, "I'll Go Where You Want Me to Go, Dear Lord," had just been announced.

"It may not be on the mountain's height,
Or over the stormy sea:
It may not be at the battle's front
My Lord may have need of me.
But, if by a still small voice He calls
To paths that I do not know,
I'll answer, dear Lord, with my hand in Thine,
I'll go where You want me to go."

Earnestly and with great feeling Mr. Armstrong read the lines. "Let us not sing this hymn carelessly, but rather let us realize what the words mean. If the test were made tonight I wonder how many of us would prove true? It's easy to sing, 'I'll go where You want me to go,' but it may be a 'trial as by fire' for us to go. Now let us all sing and mean what we sing."

Led by the Memorial Chorus the familiar words rang out heartily.

As the second verse was being sung, an usher stepped to the platform and told Mr. Armstrong that he was wanted on the phone. When, a few moments later, he returned to the church he was pale but composed. A few whispered words to his mother and to one of the ministers and he again left the church, taking his mother with him.

As the door closed behind them the singing ceased and the minister to whom Mr. Armstrong had spoken rose and in a voice trembling with emotion said: "To the pastor of this church has come the 'testing time' of which he spoke only a few moments ago and he has proved himself true blue. You all know that the Misses Livingstone of our town are lying at the Emergency hospital, suffering with smallpox. When Brother Armstrong left us a few moments ago he received a phone message from the hospital physician saying that both girls were in a critical condition and that they were pleading for a minister in order that they might receive spiritual comfort and be baptized. He has gone to those dying girls. Let us pray."

As Gordon Armstrong led his mother into the parsonage, a full realization of what he was about to do swept over him. "It is not a brave man who does not fear danger but rather should we call him brave who, fully realizing the danger, still goes forth to fulfill his duty." So with Gordon Armstrong—he was no less a hero because he realized the danger of the step he was about to take. Very quietly he bade his mother "good by." It was not a time for talking but for doing and there was no hesitancy in his step as he started for the hospital.

As the door closed upon her boy, Mrs. Armstrong's composure deserted her. For his sake she had kept the tears back while he remained with her but as she sat there by his study fire, alone, no one could wonder that the mother heart was sad. Bravely she fought against her fears as she sat in the quiet, waiting for some message from the hospital. "His duty was to go; mine is to wait," she said to herself.

Reaching the hospital, Gordon found Dr. Benson anxiously waiting for him in the tiny office. "Mr. Armstrong," he said, "I'm mighty glad you've come. The case of these Livingstone girls is one of the saddest I've ever handled. The older one, Miss Elsa, is dying, and both girls realize it. I suppose I really should not have phoned for you but when they pleaded so hard for a minister I could not refuse to at least try to grant their request. I confess I was very doubtful of your coming, but Miss Myra insisted, 'I know Mr. Armstrong will come,' and she evidently knew her man. I'm glad you're here."

"Well, doctor," replied Mr. Armstrong, "I wouldn't have had much respect for myself if I had refused to answer a call as urgent as this. I'm here to give what help and comfort I can to those poor girls. Will I be allowed to return home tonight or must I remain here in quarantine? I'd like to phone some word of certainty to my mother for she will be very anxious; then I'm in your hands, ready to act as you may direct."

"Personally, I don't think that you'll be in any danger of carrying the disease," was the doctor's reply, "for you'll be thoroughly disinfected before leaving here so you may go home,—but—in obedience to orders from the Board of Health, I must insist that you go into quarantine in your own home for a couple of weeks. If at the end of that time no trouble develops, and I think none will, the authorities will be willing for you to resume your regular work. We have to take every precaution for the good of all."

"I understand perfectly," said Mr. Armstrong. "I'll phone my mother to prepare the third floor of the parsonage for me and up there I'll be completely isolated. If the unexpected should happen, I'll——"

"Don't have such a thought in your mind," broke in Dr. Benson, hurriedly. "Come with me."

When a few minutes later the preacher emerged from the dressing-room, he was attired in a loose white robe reaching to his feet, with a white muslin cap completely covering his head. But the change of attire had not altered the great tender heart nor dimmed the luster of the kindly beaming eye. Full of sympathy and eager to help, he entered the ward.

There in a screened off corner of the long whitewashed room, upon two cots, side by side, lay the disease-marked forms of the girls he had last seen in church so full of health and strength. There was no sign of beauty in those swollen, discolored faces. Instinctively Gordon Armstrong closed his eyes to shut out the harrowing sight. When at last he found courage to approach the nearest cot, he found the eyes of Myra Livingstone fastened upon him with such a look of unutterable sadness that all fear and horror fled from him and only a great desire to help and comfort took possession of him.

Some scenes are too sacred for pen of writer to touch upon or brush of artist to portray. Only the Recording Angel could write down the record of that midnight visit but ere the morning broke the Joy Bells of Heaven were ringing with the news that two more hearts had made their peace with God. Oh, how tenderly had the message of love been given to the stricken girls. Truly, divine help and inspiration were given to the preacher in his "hour of testing."

Before leaving, Mr. Armstrong, at Myra's request, administered to both girls the rite of Christian baptism. It needed no physician's voice to tell him that Elsa was nearing the end of the journey, and when he said "good by" he realized that ere the sun would set on another day she would be in the land where sickness and suffering are unknown and where "farewell" is never spoken.

Myra's few words at parting and the look of peace on the face of her dying sister more than repaid him for the risk he had taken.

As Mr. Armstrong turned from the screened-in beds, the nurse whispered to him: "Won't you speak just a word to the rest of the patients? When it was rumored that a minister was coming to see the Misses Livingstone, every patient in the ward became interested."

"How many patients have you now?" queried Mr. Armstrong.

"Fifteen," replied the nurse. "Nine in this ward, and six, including one little boy, in the men's. We expect another doctor and a head nurse from the city tomorrow. Fortunately, most of the cases have been light ones and the authorities think that the epidemic is under control. Still, they're not taking any chances."

Looking at the little uniformed figure by his side, Gordon said huskily: "You're a brave little woman to stand by this job. Of course I'll speak to the rest of your patients."

From bed to bed they went, minister and nurse, giving comfort, for body and soul, as best they might, to each sufferer.

As they entered the men's ward they were greeted by an enthusiastic cry from the bed by the far window: "There he is! I knew he'd come!"

Approaching the bed, Mr. Armstrong said: "Helloa, Harry! How did you know me in these funny clothes? And why aren't you asleep?"

"I——"

"Oh," broke in the nurse quietly, "Harry's been begging to see you ever since he was brought here and when I heard Dr. Benson say that you were coming to see the Misses Livingstone, I peeped in here and, finding Harry awake, I told him the good news. He evidently has shared his secret with the other patients, for, see, all eyes are turned this way."

"It was the strangest audience I ever faced," said Mr. Armstrong afterwards, "but the Lord surely put words in my mouth. I only spoke a few moments but I tried to make it a message of comfort and good cheer."

After taking every precaution possible, Mr. Armstrong bade Dr. Benson good by and hurried through the deserted streets back to the parsonage. As his key turned in the lock, his mother was there to greet him.

"No, no, mother," he cried, "don't come near me! Let me go upstairs at once. Remember I'm under quarantine and——"

"All right," bravely acquiesced his mother, "so am I, and we'll face the future together. Ellen is away because of her mother's death and I've written giving her a two weeks' vacation and we'll just keep house alone until the quarantine is lifted. The phone will bring us all we need and, Gordon——"

"Mother! Mother!" broke in her son, "I can't allow you to take this risk. You——"

Gently but positively he was silenced as she led him to the foot of the stairs.

"Go and get some sleep, you're worn out. In the morning we can plan for the days ahead. No, not another word," she insisted.

Like a tired child Gordon climbed the stairs, obedient to his mother's command.

With mother wisdom, Mrs. Armstrong did not follow but going to the kitchen she prepared a tempting tray of crisp toast, hot milk and fruit. Reaching his room, she persuaded him to eat the lunch she put before him, and then sitting down on the side of the bed she "mothered" him until he fell asleep.

The strain upon his emotional nature had been great and he slept the sleep of complete exhaustion.

He was roused by the ringing of his study telephone. It was, as he feared, a message from the hospital.

"Miss Elsa died a half hour after you left, Mr. Armstrong. Her mother has requested that you conduct the simple services at the grave. A carriage will call for you at two."

Sad, indeed, was the burial! Only the undertaker and the old family physician, Dr. Smythe, representing the stricken mother, stood with uncovered heads as the flower-covered casket was lowered into its last resting place. Gordon Armstrong's voice trembled with emotion as he spoke the old familiar words, "dust to dust."

By the following Sabbath the town was wild with excitement over the action of the Memorial pastor. Some censured him—some lauded him to the skies. By some his action was

Stella Rosevelt

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

Not the least attractive was the light and airy, though costly, phaeton of "Mr. Rosevelt's ward."

"You can be gratified, for there she stands now."

With an angry gleam in his eyes, he led Star from the room.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

A terrible storm at sea and from a steamer running between Liverpool and New York is Stella Rosevelt Gladstone, an orphan, on her way to distant relatives in New York. She is befriended by Jacob Rosevelt, who is startled when he learns her mother called her "Star," her grandmother giving her the name. A fire breaks out and the boats are rapidly filled. Stella refuses to go unless room is made for Mr. Rosevelt, who the next day suffers from an ill turn and is carefully nursed by her. The sixth day they are rescued. Mr. Rosevelt is told of the care Stella gave him during his illness and while thanking her a young man approaches and Mr. Rosevelt introduces Archibald Sherbrooke, whose home is in Derbyshire where Star's father preached. Star's shawl becomes loosened and not finding the pin, Mr. Sherbrooke draws one, an exquisitely carved stone, from his necktie, and Stella pins the shawl and then tells the story of the wreck and her endeavor to save Mr. Rosevelt's life. Arriving in New York, Mr. Sherbrooke places a card in her hand with his address upon it. Stella, remembering the pin, passes it to him. He begs her to keep it as a souvenir. Wishing she had something to give, he will accept a lock of her hair. Stella is met by Mrs. Blunt, Mrs. Richards' housekeeper, who hurries her away. Stella receives a cool reception from her aunt, who had written she would befriend and educate Stella until able to care for herself, and learns she is to be degraded to the level of a common servant. She asks her aunt if her father, from what she wrote him, had any idea she was to come into the family as a servant. Mrs. Richards does not relent, and Stella appeals to Mr. Richards, giving him the letter written by her father to Mrs. Richards and her reply. Stella has one hundred pounds. Could she not use it and then teach, relieving his wife of all responsibility? Mrs. Richards is surprised at Stella's suggestion and Mr. Richards makes arrangements for her to attend a select school, she giving a part of each day to household work. Stella wins, at commencement, a part in the class exercises and surprises Mr. Richards by her instrumental music, essay and promotion to the senior class. Josephine, admiring the cameo worn by Stella suggests she give it to her, as her wardrobe does not correspond with it. Going to Stella's room and finding the cameo, Josephine takes it and discovers the initials "A. S." Stella misses the cameo and is suspicious who has it. In the meanwhile Mr. Richards receives a letter from Mrs. Richards' Uncle Jacob. He has lost all, is penniless and will accept the home that was offered him when rich. Mrs. Richards refuses to receive him, the house is full, and Mr. Richards is left troubled. Upon his arrival he is taken to the Lodge to sleep, Mr. Rosevelt meets Star who offers her room to him and does all she can to brighten his life. Mrs. Richards receives him coldly, and Josephine ignores her uncle. Mrs. Richards and Josephine go to Long Branch where they meet Lord Carroll, of Carrolton, Derbyshire, England, who appears pleased with Josephine and requests permission of her mother to call. Noticing a ring Josephine wears and examining it he sees the initials "A. S." Josephine claims it is given by a relative. Lord Carrol cannot understand it. The next day he leaves for New York. Stella, hurrying to take a train for home, and in danger, is stopped by Archibald Sherbrooke and the acquaintance renewed. Stella tells him that she and Mr. Rosevelt are in the same home. Mr. Rosevelt goes to New York with Stella to call upon Mr. Sherbrooke in his studio and arranges a pleasure trip for them to Coney Island for the following day. When they return from it Stella is the promised wife of Archibald Sherbrooke. Lord Carrol, of Carrolton, thought to be Josephine's betrothed, is expected. Stella sees in him her promised husband, Archibald Sherbrooke. She passes a sleepless night. Walking to the lodge, she meets Archibald, and he cannot understand why he finds her there. Believing he is acting a part, for he wins her love as Archibald Sherbrooke, he appears as Lord Carrol of Carrolton, the expected husband of her cousin, and refusing his explanation she bids him go back to Josephine and ask her for the cameo he gave her. Archibald seeks Mr. Richards' confidence and explains his position, his meeting Star on the steamer, his interest in her and later her promised husband, his ignorance that she is an inmate of this house, his meeting Stella and her refusal to listen to him. Mrs. Richards, overhearing his story and determined that her plans shall not fail, seeks Stella in the lodge, where she has gone for sympathy from Mr. Rosevelt. She upbraids Stella for conducting herself in a shameless manner, misconstruing Lord Carrol's attentions and accusing him with unfaithfulness. Stella is crushed with shame and humiliation, and the next morning Mr. Rosevelt and Stella go to New York where they make their home. Lord Carrol leaves a note for Josephine requesting her to send the cameo to his address that he may return it to the owner should he be so happy as to find her. Stella graduates with honor from the Normal College and Mr. Appleton introduces her as the author of "Chatsworth's Pride." She meets Grace Meredith and her brother Ralph who requests the pleasure, with his sister, of calling upon her. Reaching home, Mr. Rosevelt tells to Stella the story of his life, his love for and engagement to be married to Stella's grandmother, and then his love for her for her kindness to him. She goes to her room and opens the sealed package given to her by her father.

CHAPTER XXIV.

WHAT NEXT?

STAR Gladstone's eighteenth birthday dawned as bright and charming as it was possible for a morning to be. At eight o'clock she and Mr. Rosevelt sat down to their breakfast, and a merry meal they made of it, for both appeared in the best of spirits, in spite of the sad and exciting events of the previous evening upon which they had conversed.

About nine a handsome carriage drove to their humble abode, and the driver rang and asked for the "gentleman and lady who were going for a drive in the park."

Star looked surprised as she peered from the window and saw a pair of sleek, coal-black horses, with their silver-mounted harnesses, and the shining, velvet-lined coach.

"Uncle Jacob, did you order that carriage to come for us?" she asked.

"Yes, my dear," he said, with an expression of satisfaction, as he, too, looked out and saw the team. "It is not often that I ride, as you well know, but when I do, I like to go in style. One ride a year in 'shipshape' would satisfy me, where a half dozen in some broken-down hack wouldn't give me a bit of pleasure. Now, put on your hat, and tuck some roses in your belt, as you did yesterday, for this is to be a gala day, and I want you as fine as possible."

Star laughed and tripped away to obey, coming back after a few moments with such a bright and happy face that Mr. Rosevelt thought she had never looked so lovely before.

All the morning they drove, four long, delightful hours—hours that were always a pleasant memory afterward to both of them; and many who saw the nicely dressed old gentleman, with the fair, bright, golden-haired girl beside him in their elegant carriage, thought what a green old age must be his, with so much to make life pleasant.

About one o'clock they turned toward the city once more, and Star said, with a sigh of pleasure:

"Uncle Jacob, I believe there never was such a perfect day before, and I'm sure I never enjoyed a birthday more. You were very kind to plan this pleasure for me."

The old gentleman's eyes twinkled. Her delight, her bright, animated face were such a joy to him.

"If I only had been rich as I used to be, I should so like to have made you some nice present today—a watch, for instance," he said.

"You gave me something last night which I value far better—your confidence," Star said, softly. "I should like a watch," she added, after a moment, "and I mean to have one some time. When I have earned it, you shall go and select it for me, if you will. But what have you done with your own, Uncle Jacob? You had a very nice one when I first met you, and I remember seeing it on you after the wreck."

"Watches and I have not had much in common during the last two years," he answered, evasively; and she thought perhaps he had been obliged to sell it since he became poor.

All at once the carriage stopped in a quiet street uptown, which, Star noticed, was lined on both sides with elegant brownstone dwellings.

"What are we stopping here for?" she asked.

"A good woman whom I used to know lives here, and I thought, as we were in gala attire today, I would like to stop and make a call, and—introduce my Star to her," Mr. Rosevelt said, preparing to alight.

He helped Star out, and together they went up the marble steps.

Mr. Rosevelt rang the bell, and then took a card from one of his pockets, and, with an arch smile, said:

"It almost seems as if we were really fine people, doesn't it, dressed in our best, riding about in our carriage, and sending our cards in at a brownstone house?"

"Yes, indeed; and it would be such fun if we could keep it up for a while," Star said, gayly.

Mr. Rosevelt laughed.

"Would you like to be a fine lady, Star?" he asked.

"I don't know," she answered, thoughtfully. "I believe I should like to try it for a little while, just to see how it would seem."

There was not time for any more conversation, for the door was at this moment opened by a neat-looking servant.

She appeared to recognize Mr. Rosevelt, for she greeted him with a smile, and then her eyes wandered inquiringly to Star's lovely face.

She invited them to enter, and conducted them into a handsome drawing-room on the right of the hall, when, taking Mr. Rosevelt's card, she retired, leaving them alone.

"What a lovely room!" Star breathed, as her eyes roved about the apartment.

Mr. Rosevelt merely nodded his head in reply, while he watched the door with evident impatience.

It was soon slowly opened, and a familiar face appeared in the aperture—a face all beaming with smiles of pleasure and good nature.

"Mrs. Blunt!" cried Star, in astonishment; and springing toward the woman, she grasped both her hands warmly.

"Yes, Miss Star," the woman returned, half laughing, half crying; "I am Mrs. Blunt, or I'm much mistaken, as I sometimes imagine I may be when I get to thinking about everything, and how strange it has all turned out. How well you're looking, miss, and it does my old eyes a wonderful sight of good to see your bright face again."

Star thought her language somewhat ambiguous; but everything seemed rather ambiguous just then.

"Do you live here?" she questioned.

"Yes, I live here; or——"

"Have you been in New York long? and why haven't we seen you before? and what are you laughing at?"

The young girl's astonishment seemed to increase, for the woman appeared strangely, and was shaking with suppressed laughter.

"I'm laughing because I'm so glad to see you. I've been in New York a month, and haven't been to see you because the last time I saw Mr. Rosevelt he told me he was going to bring you to see me soon; so I've been content to wait," Mrs. Blunt explained.

Star wondered if the present occupant of that elegant place allowed her housekeeper to entertain her friends in the drawing-room; if so, it was surely a new departure, and not exactly in accordance with Mrs. Richards' ideas of the treatment of servants.

"Take off your hat, dearie," Mrs. Blunt continued, "for I have a nice little lunch waiting for you."

"A lunch?" repeated Star, in amazement, and with a puzzled look at Mr. Rosevelt, who was regarding her attentively.

"Yes; I had orders to get up the nicest lunch I could for my old friends, and I'm much mistaken if I haven't done it," the woman replied, with an air of satisfaction.

"You must have a very kind mistress," the fair girl said, as she drew off her gloves and removed her hat.

"I have, the best in the world," the queer creature returned with a chuckle. "But come, I'll show you the way to the dining-room."

Mr. Rosevelt arose, and drawing Star's hand within his arm, followed her to a room on the opposite side of, and farther down, the hall.

As she opened the door, Star saw a charming dining-room, furnished in costly woods of different colors, its floor inlaid in an artistic and lovely pattern.

In the center stood a table, covered with a heavy white damask cloth, and spread with a glittering array of silver and cut glass, and where also a most tempting repast was awaiting them.

Mr. Rosevelt led his wondering companion to one side of the table, and, looking down upon her with the fondest look in the world, said, in a voice which was not quite steady:

"Star, my dear, my pure-hearted, faithful little friend, I here formally install you as mistress of your own table and of your own home. This is to be your seat henceforth—mine opposite; and, my darling—for such you have become to me—I trust you will be as happy as an old man's love, gratitude and wealth can make you."

Star had grown suddenly pale while he spoke, and regarded him with a puzzled expression.

"I do not understand," she said, clasping both her small hands around his arm and leaning heavily upon him.

"I will tell you," he answered, tenderly. "When you met me on board that ill-fated steamer I was a very rich man. When it was wrecked, and I had discovered that you were the grandchild of the only woman whom I ever loved, and also what a kind, tender little heart you had, I formed a sudden resolution. I had always, as I told you last night, been flattered and cajoled by my relatives, who knew I was rich, and I resolved that I would test their sincerity. If they stood it, I would divide my fortune into three portions, one of which should be yours, the others theirs. If they did not, it should all be yours, if you proved the true, noble character which I believed you to be. That was one reason why I was so keenly disappointed to find you gone when I went to bid you farewell on the steamer; but I meant to search for you all the time. And so I pretended to be the poor old man whom you remember coming to Ellen Richards' that night. You know the result. No one was true to me or kind to me but my Star. Yet I had become so suspicious of everybody, that I resolved to study even you thoroughly before I committed myself; and so I concluded to wait until you had completed your education before telling you of my actual position in life. It was very hard, though, when you were in such trouble that last night in Yonkers, when you told me your secret about writing your book, and offered to share your little all with me 'because I was not happy there,' and I was sorely tempted to tell you all, surround you at once with everything to make life beautiful, and place you in a position far above the daughter of the woman who had treated you so shamefully. On second thought, however, I deemed it best to wait until your education should be completed, for then you would be more free to enjoy the good things of life."

"Then you have not been poor at all?" faltered Star, as he paused for a moment.

"No; I have had abundance. I own this house, and have for years. I own a block on Broadway, and—well, little one, there is enough to enable you and me to do pretty much as we like for the remainder of our lives," he answered, with a fond smile.

"Then I cannot take care of you. I thought I was going to make you so comfortable, and that, with teaching and the income from my book, we could have such nice times together," Star said, wistfully, and hardly able, even yet, to comprehend the change in her circumstances.

Mr. Rosevelt patted her softly on the shoulder, though a tear sprang to his eyes at her words.

"No, dear," he returned; "you cannot take care of me in that way. I am going to take care of you; but you can still make me comfortable. We can still have nice times together, and I shall be very proud to introduce the young authoress of 'Chatsworth's Pride' as my ward and future heiress.

"Bless you, child!" he continued, his fine face glowing with happiness; "don't you suppose it is going to be a comfort to me to try to make you happy and give you everything you wish, after all your constancy, patience and self-denial for me?"

He forced her gently into her chair, and going around to the opposite side of the table, began to wait upon her in the most chivalrous manner.

"Ah! this is what I call comfort, dear," he said, in a satisfied tone, after Mrs. Blunt had withdrawn to see that the strawberries and cream were properly served; "this is what I have been dreaming about for a whole year; and now, after we have appeased our hunger, we will go over the house, and see if everything suits you. What are you looking at the clock for? Your school days are over, Miss Gladstone."

Star laughed somewhat nervously, and flushed.

"I was looking to see how many hours would elapse before the clock would strike twelve, and wondering if it would dissolve the spell that is on me."

"No fear of that, Starling. The hours, days and months, and years, I trust, will roll by and bring you only joy and pleasure, with no rude awakening. You shall have music and painting to your heart's content. You shall have a pair of ponies and a phaeton of the most approved style; and, in fact, little girl, it will take you a good while to find the bottom of my purse. But how do you like your tea-service? I chose it myself, and had it marked expressly for you."

"It is perfectly lovely," Star replied, as her eyes roved admiringly over the beautiful and costly equipage, upon each piece of which there gleamed a star in delicate frost-work.

"I'm glad you like it. And now, my dear, suppose you open that small box by your plate."

Star gave him a wondering look—indeed, all her looks had been wondering ones during the last hour—and opened a small white box, which had until now lain unnoticed beside her plate.

She found inside a morocco case, and springing back the lid of this, an elegant little watch and chatelaine were exposed to her delighted eyes.

"Uncle Jacob! I cannot tell whether I am awake or dreaming," she cried, a rosy flush spreading over her whole face. "It is the dearest little watch in the world. And is this star on the case made of diamonds?"

"Yes; diamonds are none too good for my star."

"And you had this waiting for me, even when we were talking about my having a watch while we were driving?"

"Yes; I was only sounding you a little to see if you would like a watch best or something else. Now, if you are through, put it in your belt and come with me," he said, rising from the table.

She followed his example, and together they passed from the beautiful dining-room out into the hall, and thence to another room on the front of the house, which was fitted up as half library, half music room.

In it there stood a new Steinway piano, with a richly carved case and pearl keys. The handsome bookcases, each surmounted by books of popular authors, were filled with choice volumes, while the other furniture, upholstered in olive and crimson, was most luxurious.

From here they went upstairs, and over the drawing-room found a most charming suite of rooms, furnished throughout in blue and white.

"Allow me to introduce you to the heiress of Jacob Rosevelt, the millionaire," said the old gentleman, taking her hand and bowing before the fair apparition in a full-length mirror. "How do you like her?"

"I can't tell just yet, she is such a new creature; but," with a roguish look up into his eyes, "I'm very fond of the millionaire."

"Thank you, Miss Gladstone; your favor is most highly appreciated," he returned, laughing. "But come, you must see my bachelor den;" and he led her across the hall to a room over the dining-room, and here she found every comfort, if something less of elegance.

Opposite her sitting-room there was a great chamber, furnished in crimson and gold, while up another flight were the servants' rooms. Mrs. Blunt's rooms were on the lower floor, where she could conveniently overlook her assistants at all hours.

"It is like a story," Star said, when they had been the rounds and came back to the library; "and now what are we to do next, Uncle Jacob?"

Her plans had all been for work, and now that she found there was to be no more toil or care for her—nothing but pleasure and what her own sweet will dictated, she hardly knew whether or how to take up the thread of her life again; therefore the query:

"What are we to do next, Uncle Jacob?"

CHAPTER XXV.

STAR'S DELIGHT.

"What are we going to do next?" Mr. Rosevelt repeated. "Why, enjoy it all, to be sure. I have waited a good while for this good time, and now I am going to make the most of it. First, Miss Gladstone must attend to that very important item, Miss Gladstone's wardrobe, which must be suitable for her position; and, Star, I shall be quite particular upon that point; let it be both rich and elegant. Then, as the hot weather comes on, there will be a trip to Newport and the White Mountains, or some other place equally pleasant, and after that—well, something else, I suppose," he concluded, with a smile.

Star heaved a sigh of delight.

It was nice, after all, to be surrounded by all this beauty and elegance, and to have everything heart could wish.

The next fortnight was a busy one with dressmakers, milliners and seamstresses; for Mr. Rosevelt said he wished to go to Newport by the middle or last of July, if possible.

Star's wardrobe and pretty things were all ready at last, and Mr. Rosevelt, who had taken a strange interest in it, for a bachelor, was perfectly satisfied.

He had made her elegant presents in the way of jewelry and laces, until she felt almost overwhelmed.

"Diamonds!" she had exclaimed, her face flushing all over with delight, when, the day before they were to leave, he came into her sitting-room and laid a case in her lap, telling her to open it. He had already purchased her several other sets, but this was the crowning gift of all.

"Oh, Uncle Jacob," she faltered, "I am afraid you are spending too much money for me."

"Don't you like them?" he questioned, although her glowing face should have told him all he wished to know.

"Like them? They are perfectly lovely; and I do particularly love diamonds."

"Then don't trouble your pretty head about the money. You know I have been denied all my life the pleasure of spending it for either wife or child, and now that I have found some one who appreciates and is worthy of it, let me get all the comfort I can in this way. You forget," he

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

ANYTHING pertaining to the home is always of interest and in the several letters that follow are many entirely new ideas, and clever ones, too. Mrs. Peal's description of a burlap porch set is particularly good and there is yet time to make it before summer. Ideas such as these are better suited to the average family—and pocketbook—than something made of more expensive material, and are usually more durable. Tell us how you made "something of nothing."—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Mother and I think dear old COMFORT the grandest little paper published and always look forward to its coming. The sisters are giving ideas on making something out of nothing, as I call it, so I'll try my hand. Most all of you have burlap bags. I am making a handsome porch cover set of them. I cut each bag open and take the side that has no printing on it, and cut it to fit my swing, settee or chair. You can scallop the edges if you like or bind with tape of any desired color. I hand paint mine, a basket of flowers in the center of each piece with gay colors. If you can't paint, use carbon or transfer paper and stamp any design you have, and color. If the bag is too short for your swing or settee, make two cushions and lace together in the center with shoestrings. You will be surprised at the lovely set you will have. I am making some pillow tops now. Then something else: I take old straw cuff protectors, cut them down one side and bind with tape. Lace the two together with flat shoestrings and paint or work some design on them with colored threads. They make pretty flower pot holders. You can use as many holders as is necessary to cover your pots. The flat string makes it look better. I have lots of one hundred pound sugar bags (we are in the grocery business) and I make sleeping pillow cases of them, putting on some kind of a border. I make short curtains for the kitchen of them also, with a bright colored border. Two bags make one pair of curtains and they launder beautifully. For long curtains for my bedroom I use four bags to a pair. The bags are put together with tatting, rickrack braid, insertion or any kind of heavy lace. I painted a parrot on each curtain and an owl and the moon in the center of the little drop at the top, then outlined around each design with a black yarn thread in long stitch. Then I made a bedspread to match, out of unbleached sheeting instead of the bags. I made this long enough to turn back over the pillows at the head with a border of pink at top and bottom and a parrot in the center. I have received many compliments on the set. I have made little tea aprons of bags, with different objects on them in patchwork, such as teapot, cream pitcher, or cup and saucer.

I hope these little suggestions will be helpful to someone, and I wish the sisters would give us some ideas on entertaining clubs. I think we are all anxious for new ideas along that line. I belong to an Art and Needle Club but we just exchange ideas on the work, have music and when we get tired of working we sometimes have a few games of five hundred or bridge and then the hostess serves a little lunch and that's about all we do.

I would be very glad to hear from any who care to write. With all good wishes for dear old COMFORT and its readers,

Sincerely yours, MRS. ESTHER TAYLOR PEAL.

MELBOURNE, MO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Will you let a red head from the Show Me state in this glorious morning? I haven't a thing to write about that would really admit me but then—Columbus took a chance. I know this is Saturday and I should be at work but I get tired and want to get out into the sunshine and romp and sing. A regular tomboy, I hear some of the very sedate saying, but I am considered a good housekeeper at that. I'm trying to think of what I know that would help others but my store of knowledge is very slim. Wait a minute! Sacks!! I know we've discussed sacks and more sacks and their uses but here is one kind of a sack that I use that I've never seen discussed. The gunny sack. We moved into a large house, double doors and no drapes and not furniture enough to fill it, so old red head got to thinking. Very little money to help me think so took gunny sacks and made drapes for my double doors. I wanted my room done in green so I purchased several packages of dye and after washing the sacks I colored them green. You can make fringe on the bottoms by drawing the threads and tying the loose ends in the usual way. I had an old couch that was covered with red plush and I made a couch cover for that of green sacks, fringed all around, then a scarf of the same for my library table. I needed some small rugs so made them of double thicknesses of sacks, stitched or quilted together, and sides bound with a harmonizing color. Make a short fringe on the ends. These rugs can be made much prettier by embroidering a design in carpet warp on them. Then I needed something to fill up the great empty corners and the couch. I colored three sacks green, a lighter green than the other, brown and red, and made six cushions, round, square and oblong. After draping my windows with an inexpensive piece of cretonne, to match the other drapes, my room didn't look half bad; in fact, I had many compliments on it.

I know you are wondering where I got so many sacks. Sh, if I ever tell it aloud the storekeepers will hear, then good by to Red and her sacks. I buy potatoes in one-half bushel quantities and ask the groceryman to put my groceries in a sack—"so they'll be easier to carry."

How many of you ever had a real embarrassing situation jump up to confront you? I'll tell you one that happened to me. On one of our trips from the West here and we had a three hour wait in St. Paul and as the weather was extremely warm I got thirsty. Daddy kept baby while I started to the fountain but I did not get there, for I was embarrassed to find my way. The cause? My skirts dropped all in a heap. Picture me if you can! What did I do? I don't really know, but after years, it seemed, I found my way to the ladies' dressing-room with my garments in my arms. Needless to say I left a roaring crowd behind me.

Mrs. Wilkinson, there's a heap more I would like to say and ask about but this is every bit of stationery in the house. So with good wishes to all I'll leave.

RED.

Red.—A red-haired person can always be depended upon to meet every emergency and to think of something interesting. An account of our most embarrassing moments should prove amusing as well as helpful, for one never knows what will happen next and it is well to be prepared. We can learn from each other and have a laugh at the same time. I'm trying to think of the most embarrassing thing that ever happened to me. Everyone send in their experience and we'll have them published along with the most thrilling and most exciting things that have happened to the readers. I already have a number on hand for publication.—Ed.

ALLEGAN, MICH.

DEAR COMFORT RELATIVES:

It's been a year since I called last time so thought I'd poke around once more and see if the latch-string is still out. Not long ago I received a letter from a Montana sister asking when the store was going to materialize, that I mentioned in my last letter. I have no idea when but it is drawing nearer each day and when it does and you come to town you will find V. E. at the front door with a big grin, waiting to give you a glad welcome to the Ellis store. You can sit around the heater, toast your toes and talk politics to your heart's content, just as long as you do not get up any roof raising argument on politics or religion. I am very good natured and stand for most anything in reason.

I have just had a new (Corona) typewriter so will have to have a typist. The first to apply lands the job. Salary no object. But laying all joking aside, my mail order and magazine agency is growing year by year and I feel sure that some day, with God's help, I will see my dream materialize in that I'll be self-supporting and can then say good by to the County House. I've been here eleven years and have no kicks. Have a splendid man and his wife for keepers, there couldn't be better. In all the time I've been here I've never had a cross word from them or any of the hired help and I can't see but what I'm as happy as folks who can walk and work. I don't care if I am nearly helpless. I've got my brain left and I'll never give up beaten until I get crippled in my head or so sick I can't do anything. I am determined to make good in life and when I do I'll consider that I've accomplished more, by God's help, than many a man who has never seen a sick day.

I notice that many of the COMFORT writers ask for suggestions as to how they can make money and many have written and asked me that question. To ask me that is about like asking a bald-headed barber for a tonic to grow hair on a bald head, for I've never made enough money to worry about. But here is something that may be of help to someone. Last summer I read of a woman in a Western city who made aprons and left them at a big department store to be sold. They went so fast the manager had her make more and soon she was hiring help and supplying other stores and her sales branched out to other cities and states until in a few years she had a big force of women working for her. I hope this will be a good starter for some one.

I've written several letters to COMFORT but have never asked the readers to write me but I will this time. For 44 years I've had a birthday between May and July and expect it will come the same time this year so if you will write me a birthday letter or card I'll thank you very much. Don't send me anything but cards and letters for I haven't room for other things.

I will close with best wishes to COMFORT and its readers.

From your brother and cousin.

VERNE ELLIS.

COMFORT Sisters: While you are about it, can't you manage to include an order, even a small one, or a subscription, when you send our Brother Verne a birthday letter? I seldom make a request like this, but I know how deserving he is of any assistance. He doesn't want charity, but just a chance to help himself. Write for his circulars if you want to know about him.—Ed.

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

THERE comes a time in the spring and early summer when the winter supply of vegetables is sadly diminished and only the humble potato remains to tide us over until the summer crop is ready for consumption. This isn't as serious as would appear for there are so many ways of preparing potatoes, a few of which are given below, that they do not become monotonous. Try these and see how you like them.—Ed.

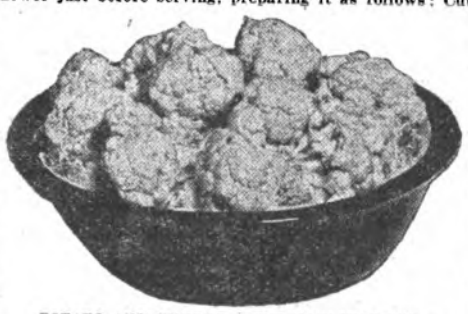
BAKED HAM AND POTATOES.—Slice six or eight medium-sized potatoes into baking dish, sprinkle with a little pepper and add enough hot water to very nearly cover. Over top of potatoes place one and one-half pounds of ham, cover and cook three-quarters of an hour, turning ham when necessary.

POTATO SURPRISE.—To two cups of cold mashed potatoes, add one egg, salt and pepper to taste, and form into small, flat cakes. On each cake put a teaspoon of cold meat, chopped fine, fold potato mixture over this and form into balls. Dip in eggs and crumbs and fry in deep, hot fat.

POTATO SOUFLE.—Mix four cups of hot mashed potatoes with one tablespoon melted butter, two tablespoons hot milk, one teaspoon salt, one-eighth teaspoon pepper, one-quarter teaspoon paprika and the beaten yolks of two eggs. Fold in the stiffly-beaten whites of two eggs, put into buttered baking dish and cook until mixture puffs and is of brown color.—MRS. L. E. H., Manchester, N. H.

CREAMED POTATOES.—Heat one cup of milk, add one tablespoon of butter and thicken with one tablespoon of flour. Add pepper and salt to taste and two cups of cold boiled potatoes, cut into cubes.

POTATOES AU GRATIN.—In a buttered baking dish put alternate layers of sliced cooked potatoes and grated cheese, a thick layer of potatoes and a thin layer of cheese. Dot the potatoes with bits of butter and add salt and pepper before covering with cheese. Repeat until dish is nearly filled. Add enough hot milk to nearly cover the potatoes and cover top layer with cracker-crumbs mixed with melted butter. Let bake until crumbs are browned and cheese is melted. —MRS. E. M. G., York Beach, Maine.



PARTY CAKES.—Cream one-half cup of butter and one cup of sugar; add the well-beaten yolks of three eggs, one-half cup of milk and two cups of flour sifted with two teaspoons of baking powder. Beat the whites of the eggs to a stiff froth and fold in. Flavor. Cook in well-buttered gem pans in a moderate oven. Cover with boiled frosting or whipped cream and serve on individual paper doilies, as shown in illustration.

PARTY CAKES.

BOILED FROSTING.—Boil one cup of sugar with one cup of water until it threads. Have ready the white of an egg well beaten and pour over it the boiling syrup, beating steadily. While beating, add a pinch of cream of tartar and a teaspoon of vanilla. Beat until firm.—Mrs. Johnson, Hadley, Mass.

POTATO AND CHEESE WITH CAULIFLOWER.—Three cups of raw potato sliced thin, four tablespoons of butter, four tablespoons of grated cheese, one tablespoon of scraped onion, two teaspoons of salt, and one-half teaspoon of white pepper. Arrange in deep baking dish, using alternate layers of potato, cheese, butter and seasoning. Cover tightly and bake in moderate oven about one and one-half hours. Top with boiled cauliflower just before serving, preparing it as follows: Cut away all the geeen leaves and stalk, but not close enough for the cauliflower to break apart. Also trim off any discoloration from the top. Tie in a piece of old white muslin, plunge into boiling salted water and cook until tender which will require about twenty minutes. Serve potato and cauliflower with white sauce.

POTATO AND CHEESE WITH CAULIFLOWER.

NUT BREAD.—Five cups of sifted flour, five rounded teaspoons of baking powder, one cup of sugar, two cups of milk, two cups of chopped nuts and one teaspoon salt. Sift a quantity of flour and measure out five cupfuls, add the baking powder and sift again. Now put in the sugar and add the milk, a cupful at a time, stirring briskly. Last of all add the nuts. This quantity will make two loaves. Put in ordinary bread pans and set in warm place for two hours just as you would wheat bread. Bake one hour in slow oven. —E. MCCLAIN, Corinth, Miss.

TWO WAYS OF FRYING POTATOES.—Boil in jackets, drain, and set in mouth of oven to dry. Peel, cut in halves lengthways, then each half into fourths. Drop into deep fat and brown. The potato should be fried soon after it is boiled if dry and light when done.

Another way is cook the potatoes raw. Cut the same as above, soak one hour in cold water, drain, and dry in a towel. Put into a shallow biscuit pan, and coat with salad oil, being sure not to use too much. There should be none in the bottom of pan. A good way is to stir continually with a spoon, adding the oil very gradually. Bake in a hot oven until brown, sprinkle with salt, and serve at once.

TWO WAYS OF FRYING POTATOES.

NUT BARS.—One cup of sugar, two eggs, beaten until light, one cup of walnuts, chopped fine, one heaping teaspoon of baking powder sifted in one cup of flour. Put in baking pan and bake in moderate oven.

STRAWBERRY SHERBET.—One pint and a half of juice, one pint of sugar, one pint and a half of water, the juice of two lemons. Boil water and sugar together for twenty minutes. Add lemon and strawberry juice. Strain and freeze.

ECONOMY FRUIT CAKE.—One package of raisins and three cups of water. Let boil ten minutes. In separate bowl mix one cup of lard or butter, one and one-half cup of sugar, one teaspoon cinnamon, one-half teaspoon each all other spices, two teaspoons of soda and the water the raisins were boiled in; then add the raisins and flour enough to make a stiff batter. Bake in slow oven. Frost with powdered sugar and let stand two or three days before cutting. — LILLIE JENSEN, Holden, Utah.

HANNAH'S HERMITS. — One and one-half cup granulated sugar, one cup butter or lard, three eggs, one cup chopped raisins, one-half teaspoon nutmeg, one teaspoon cinnamon, and one teaspoon soda in a little hot water. Flour enough to make a stiff batter. Roll thin. Bake in a quick oven until a golden brown. Very delicious but tastes better when a few days old. —FRENCHY, Prentice, Wisc.

ROLLED OAT COOKIES.—Two cups rolled oats, two cups flour, well sifted, one cup brown sugar, one cup of milk, one cup seedless raisins, three-quarters cup butter or lard, melted, one-half cup nut meats, chopped, two eggs, well beaten, three-quarters teaspoon soda, one teaspoon cinnamon, one-half teaspoon salt. Mix thoroughly and drop mixture from teaspoon two inches apart. Bake in very slow oven.—MRS. W. C. FITZGERALD, Redlands, Calif.

APPLE NUT PIE.—Pare and core ten apples, place them in baking pan. Make a sauce of two cups of sugar, two tablespoons flour, cinnamon and nutmeg to taste. Pour boiling water over this until mixture is as thick as starch then pour over apples and bake until tender. Have pie crusts baked, fill with apple mixture and sprinkle with chopped nuts. Serve with plain cream or whipped cream.—MRS. W. WALKER, Lane, Illinois.

MOCK MINCE PIES.—Seven crackers rolled fine, one cup sugar, one and two-thirds cup molasses, one-half cup butter, two-thirds cup cold water, two-thirds cup vinegar, raisins, cloves, cinnamon.

CRACKERS.—(Requested). Sift two cups of flour, three teaspoons baking powder and one-half teaspoon salt together. Add one cup of milk and four teaspoons melted butter, one egg, beaten separately and enough flour to make dough stiff enough to roll. Roll very thin. Cut in shape, prick with fork and bake in hot oven. After browned slightly let them remain in oven two minutes to crisp. These are fine for lunches and sandwiches.—EULA LEATHERS, Buchanan, Georgia.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

As so many of the sisters are interested in how each one fixes up her home, I am going to tell you how I have planned to fix my kitchen. I am a poor man's wife and we have to make every penny count. The woodwork in my kitchen is painted a light green. I am going to paper the walls with green oilcloth paper and as my floor oilcloth is worn in spots I am going to turn that upside down and give it two coats of paint, then varnish it. My windows will have white sash curtains with crocheted lace at the top in a pointed filet pattern, with a ring on each point to run the rod through. The curtains will be of flour sacks bleached and with a deep hem at the bottom. The top edge is turned down, gathered and then sewed to the lace. Two curtains will be needed for each window. With white oilcloth on my kitchen tables, which are painted white, my kitchen will be quite attractive.

COMFORT is a comfort to me in many ways and in the future it will be more so for I am under the doctor's care for tuberculosis. He said plenty of rest so if you sisters want to help me with that rest, just write me long, cheery letters.

I am going to send a little poem which I hope Mrs. Wilkinson will print even if she hasn't room for my letter.

Love to all. MRS. EARNEST G. POOL.

Mrs. Pool.—The poem you sent is good and will be published for the benefit of COMFORT fathers. Your kitchen must be a delightfully dainty place and I'm sure heaps of letters will find their way to it.—Ed.

MCLEANSVILLE, N. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a COMFORT reader for a long time but, like others, did not write because I was afraid of the waste-basket. But when I read Mrs. Long's letter asking advice on how to cure her boys of fighting I could not remain quiet any longer.

When your boys fight help them out by getting three good switches, give a switch to each of them and keep one yourself. Tell them you don't like to have them fight but as long as they like it you will let them whip each other. If they don't, make them by using your switch on them. This has proven successful in many cases.

I am twenty-one years old, have black hair, blue eyes and a fair complexion. I have been mraried three years and live on a farm.

MRS. J. P. BROWNING.

CALIFORNIA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I must enter this happy circle for a few words to Lena of Dallas, Texas. Her case and mine were so similar, but I cannot give her any encouragement in regard to a man like that ever changing, as it seems to be a mental weakness when a man so much older than the girl he marries, gets such ideas in his head. At least, that was my experience. I kept things hid from my neighbors for more than twenty years, raised a large family, and every time I wanted to go see a neighbor I had to ask permission. If I stayed home he was jealous and if I went to church or anywhere else it was just the same. He was nice before people but when they were gone! He got worse as the years went by and if my boys had company there was always something I did or I didn't do that was wrong. I lived in purgatory as you might say, but thank God he had no cause to treat me as he did. But there is no enjoyment in life spent with such a man. I still have him but he got so bad, more like an insane man in his conduct, we had to do the only thing we could see would cure him, send him to an asylum for a time. Since then the fear of being put back again has made him stop much of his foolishness, as a man like that thinks he owns a woman's body and soul. The whole family lived in fear and misery until the older children were able to stand up for me. But could I have foreseen that he never would change I wouldn't have wasted my life on him. And yet the experience, though dear, has taught me many things. Why should one live in torment and raise a family of nine children, yet they all love and honor Mother and that is worth all that it cost to raise them. In such a case the children do not get their rights and privileges. To give him his due, he provided to the best of his ability, bought us clothes and food, didn't spend any money for gambling or drink, but for every good thing I got in that line I paid double in agony and suffering.

Lena, look over your husband's family, were his parents and relatives the same? If so you may know it is his mind and nothing you can do or say will cure him of his illusions as he is a hopeless case and like me you may spend thirty or more years living literally a life of hell. MOTHER OF NINE.

ATHENS, WISC.

DEAR SISTERS:

I have often wanted to enter your corner but the other letters were always so much more interesting than any of mine could have been that I refrained.

I was a teacher before I married, therefore just can't help answering "Contented Wife's" question about teaching a four-year-old child the alphabet. Teach the sounds of the letters but not the names. Don't think I'm preaching but a child that knows c-a-t-s by their names can say them a thousand times without ever getting the idea that they stand for "cat," whereas if she knows the sounds by pronounciation she gets the word cat. By knowing the sounds the child can, when she goes to school, learn to pronounce by herself and what child doesn't love to find out things for herself. The present day school system tends to eliminate that which the child will have no future use for so if you wish to teach your child something for future use in school, do not teach her the letters of the alphabet. Teachers usually teach the written and printed form at the same time and the short sounds of the vowels. A good thing would be to find out from the teacher in your school district what method they use for beginners. I have had many

Time to Reduce the Heavy War Tax on Magazine Circulation

HASTILY tacked onto the War Revenue Bill of 1917 was a provision imposing a fifty per cent. increase in the letter postage rate and a much larger increase in the postage rate on second-class mail matter (magazines and newspapers). It was an emergency measure passed in a hurry to meet the strain of the National Treasury under stress of war conditions without sufficient time or opportunity for hearings or proper consideration of the rights and interests of the persons affected. Objections to the clauses relating to second-class postage rates were overcome by promising an investigation and revision of the latter at an early date. This promise was never kept. Shortly after the armistice letter postage was reduced to the normal rate in force before the war, but the second-class postage rates still remain at their highest war peak which was attained by four successive annual raises, the first having become effective in July, 1918, and the last in July, 1921, whereby the total of the increases, still in force, range from fifty per cent. in the first zone to 900 per cent. in the eighth zone, and constitute an excessively burdensome and unjust tax on magazine circulation.

The present Congress has reduced most of the war taxes and has abolished a number of them, including some of the luxury taxes. Why should not this heavy tax on magazine circulation be reduced? The newspaper and magazine publishers are asking Congress to reduce this oppressive tax by repealing the last two increases (those which became effective respectively in 1920 and 1921) in the second-class postage rates. If this requested reduction should be granted the rates would still be very high, and would yield the Government 175 per cent. more revenue than the pre-war rates. It is to the interest of subscribers as well as publishers to have the proposed reduction made. If you believe the present zone rates of second-class postage are too high and should be reduced, as proposed, write your Congressman and Senators and ask them to vote for the proposed reduction.

"A MAN whom he had intended to fleece came to the house. We were then at Paris in quarters on the Rue Rivoli. I knew before the man came what Paul's intentions were and would have saved him if I had dared, but I did not. I was more afraid of Paul than I would have been of the most savage beast. He intended to have money by fair means or foul; but I don't believe he ever intended to do the awful deed that he did. He cheated the victim as he had planned, but the man discovered him. There was a frightful quarrel. I heard loud words. Overcoming my fright, I ran into the room—just in time to see my husband drive a dagger straight into the man's heart.

"I can't tell you what occurred after that. I was like a mad thing. I knew nothing whatever until I found myself aboard a steamer bound for America."

Mrs. King paused again. She lifted her hand and wiped the moisture from her brow, which the recollection of that time had brought there. Her lips were pale and trembling.

"You had better leave the rest for another time," Underwood said kindly; but she shook her head and smiled again.

"No; let me go on!" she exclaimed. "At first I believed myself alone, and my reason came back; but I soon discovered that Paul Reade was on the same steamer, and I still in his power. At first it seemed impossible that I could ever be his wife again, but the old fear came over me. He bid me do whatever he wished, and I was afraid to refuse. But only God knows what my life was like.

"The wife of a murderer! Compelled to occupy his room, to eat at his table, to feel the touch of his blood-stained hands! And there was no mistake. With my own eyes I had seen the deed done, and I was compelled to be his partner in crime, by speaking of it to no one. I scarcely dared open my lips, lest the awful words fall from my tongue unawares. I feared to sleep, lest in my dreams I should proclaim him to the world as a murderer.

"I remained in my cabin during the greater part of the entire voyage to America, and the relief was intense when I found myself on native soil once more. I had not the courage to return to New Orleans, and with the little money that was left we secured a small cottage on the Harlem River. Then Janet Reade, Paul's mother, came to live with us. Ah, what a comfort she was to me! How often she stood between me and the wrath of my husband! And how she loved my little one, whom she believed to be her son's own child! I must have seemed crazy to her at times, for my grief had made me almost mad, and I dared not tell that gentle, loving woman the truth of her son's guilt and sin.

"But the worst had not come yet. One day Paul's mother had gone out into the country, taking baby Marian with her to see some old relative or friend, I have half-forgotten now. That was sixteen years ago, remember. Paul came in. He was intoxicated. He wanted some paper from his desk upstairs, and I went to get it for him. In order to remain out of his presence as long as possible, I pretended not to find what he wanted, and I searched among the letters, reading in an absent-minded way things that had no interest whatever for me.

"I read on and on; one letter I had read through and begun again, without knowing one word that it contained, when a passage caught my attention. I looked at the date. It was written just one week before the death of my husband. The letter was from a celebrated chemist. Paul had pretended to be interested in that line, and, as I read, a hideous thought came into my mind. The letter was detailing the effect of a certain poison which could be administered without its presence being suspected by any one who was not familiar with its workings and who suspected its presence.

"The details of the apparent effect were exact with those attending the death of Horace Morehead. There was nothing wanting. At the conclusion of the letter, the chemist said: 'I enclose a portion of the powder, which you can try upon any animal that you desire, but take care to keep it out of the way of careless persons, as there is no more dangerous drug known.'

"And then it all came before me with frightful distinctness. Paul Reade wanted my husband's money, and he had taken this terrible means to gain it. He had made a fool of Horace Morehead's senseless wife, and then killed the husband in order that he might marry her, and so gain possession of the money.

"I am convinced that in that moment I went entirely mad. I neither cared what became of me nor thought of the future of my child. I rushed into his presence and charged him with the crime that he had committed.

"He sat there with a leer in his drunken eyes, and as I accused, he acknowledged. He laughed as he told me how he had persuaded my husband to drink the fatal concoction he had prepared for him. He looked into my eyes and winked as he exclaimed:

"'You see, pretty one, it was not alone the old duffer's money that I wanted, but his wife as well; for I really was in love with you, my darling, little as you may believe it now. I loved you—next best to play—and if you had continued to shell out the money, there would never have been any trouble between us; for I really believe I am fool enough to love you now.'

"I don't remember anything after that. The time is as completely dark to me as if my life had ended. I don't know what happened after that, nor how long it was. The days and nights were an absolute blank, until one day I awakened to find myself in a room, alone. I tried to get up, but I was too weak. I wondered for a time what had happened to me, and then very slowly memory returned. I lay there trying to think it all a troubled dream of delirium, but it came too plainly and with too great force. I knew that it had happened."

"A man came in shortly afterward and gave me water. I tried to ask him questions, but he only smiled and shook his head. There was neither mirth nor compassion in the smile, but only vacancy, and I afterward learned that he was deaf and dumb.

"I was sufficiently well to sit up before Paul Reade came to see me. I had discovered that I was out in the country. In what portion, I did not know. I never saw a traveler. I don't know how the meager food was obtained that supplied the attendant and me. I sat by the window all day, and sometimes far into the night, but never a human face did I see, never a human voice did I hear. I tried by every means to make my escape, but I was as completely a prisoner as if an inmate of the Tombs.

"And then Paul Reade came. I demanded my liberty, but he refused it unless I should swear, by all that a woman held most sacred, that I would never reveal, in whole or part, either of the crimes that he had committed. I would not yield. At first he came often to see me, and then his visits became less and less frequent. More than once I am sure he came for the purpose of ending it all, and adding another to the crimes that stained his soul; but he had not the courage. He thought that the close confinement would kill me, and it very likely would have done so had it not been that the attendant used to take me for a walk about the lawn. He never left me to myself, but held my arm while I walked, still it was that to which I owe my life. But Paul Reade never knew that, and marveled at my health.

"I can't even attempt to tell you what that life was to me. I used to sit by the window and talk to the glass and the trees outside, lest I forget how to talk, and become as the animals are. And then I would grow afraid that I should grow mad under it all, and stop; but the fear of forgetting would come upon me again, and I would begin once more. Only once did I try to laugh, and the sound frightened me so that I never did it again. I knew that that would drive me mad.

"And then Paul Reade's visits became six months apart, and finally a year. I used then sometimes to see the man who stayed there harness up an old wagon and drive away. By the shortness of time that he was gone, I knew that he did not have far to go to the town, though I had no means of determining how far. He brought me clothing occasionally, and on those visits we had something a little different to eat for a day or two. He could cook well enough, but he seemed to know nothing beyond that.

"Well, one day he went into town, I suppose; but before going, he entered my room to see that all was well. It was rather later than he usually started, and because of that he brought my candle into the room before leaving. There was a single match lying upon the little tin plate beneath the candlestick. Instantly a thought leaped into my head. I scarcely dared breathe, lest I attract his attention to me, and he should read it in my face. It was the first time in all those years that any opportunity of escape had been open to me.

"I listened desperately until I heard him close the outer door. I saw him drive down the lawn, and then instantly I set to work. First I broke the glass from the windows. They were tightly barred, but plenty of air could circulate in the room. Then I took a blanket from the bed, and with the water in the tin pitcher that was in the room I saturated it, taking care to waste none of it. I was going to make a desperate venture that meant either death or liberty.

"When I had wet the blanket thoroughly I lighted the candle, and then, taking it in my hand, I went to the door and deliberately applied the flame to the woodwork. It was old and dry. Almost instantly a little tongue of fire crept up the door; and, setting the candle down where it would be safe, I watched the door burn until I saw that the fire would soon get beyond my control; then, taking the wet blanket, I smothered it out. When I had succeeded in doing it I wet the blanket again, and once more applied the candle to the door. In like manner I put out the fire again, and at the expiration of an hour I had burned a place in the door sufficiently large for me to creep through. It is true, my hands were badly burned, and my face was blackened and burned also; but I thought little of that. I was too much excited to even know that it was so.

"Think of it! For all those years I had not seen a human face except that of the deaf and dumb man; for all that time I had not heard a human voice except that of Paul Reade; I had not touched a human hand; I had not felt the influence of human sympathy, and now all that and more was promised me. Is it wonderful that I forgot my pain?

"I put the candle where I could get it in the event of wanting it again, and crept through the hole that I had burned. It let me into an outer room that was kitchen, bedroom and sitting-room for the man who had been my sole companion for so long. Scarcely able to control my emotions, I tried the door of that room. It was not locked. I threw it open. I felt the cool air upon my scorched face.

"I was free!"

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE SHADOW ON HER LIFE.

There was little more to tell after that.

The terror of finding herself so absolutely alone, without a friend in all the world, was small by comparison with all the trials through which she had passed, and received small comment. She told how she had wandered about during all the long hours of the night, frightened at each sound, in the terrible fear of recapture, and of how on the following day she had met Mrs. Presbury, directed, as she believed herself, by the hand of God.

Of how she had told the good woman the story of her life, and of the shelter that had been offered her until such time as she could find that friendship which by right belonged to her. She explained how she was forming her plans to strike at Paul Reade, in order that she might rescue her child, but that she feared to do it until the plans were sure of their effect, lest she should find herself once again in the prison from which she had so recently made her escape.

There were embraces and tears between mother and daughter, for neither had the smallest doubt of the identity of the other. But under all her happiness at the escape of her mother and the knowledge of her parentage, Marian did not forget Underwood.

She turned to him, and with the tears still standing thickly in her eyes, she took his hand with a grateful smile.

"I owe it all to you!" she exclaimed. "You have been the best, the stanchest, the most disinterested of friends. You have saved us both. What do I not owe you?"

"You owe me the privilege of being your friend still," answered Underwood, with a characteristic smile. "There are a great many things to be done, and you owe me the privilege of doing them for you. I rather think that both of you are in too much of a hysterical state to know just what is best for you at this time, and I want you to promise that you will allow me to arrange everything."

"That is like your kindness," answered Marian. "You know that it is just what I would have desired, though dared not ask. Only God can reward you for it all."

"And He will, be sure of that," exclaimed the elder woman.

"And now," cried Marian, "let us go to good Doctor Judson and tell him that his surmise was true; let us tell him that—that man was not my father."

The call upon Doctor Judson was made, and radiant with that happiness of which she never could be deprived, Marian returned to Wildhurst with the others for the night.

Contrary to his expectations, Underwood remained over in order that he might drive Marian and her mother to town the following morning, and it was not until he and Marian were separating for the night that June Beckwith's name was mentioned.

"I saw June today," he said to her, as he held her hand in his to say good night. "It was to speak to you of him that I came today."

She colored, and for the first time a little shadow crossed her brow.

"Not until tomorrow!" she exclaimed pleadingly. "I am so happy tonight that I don't want to think of—him!"

"And can't you find room in your heart to pity those who are not happy? He knows the truth—all the truth—little one, except that you are not Paul Reade's child, and his whole soul is in revolt because he cannot come to you. He loves you as he has always loved you, Marian, and he has begged me to arrange a meeting between you and him. He has begged me to assure you that he will make no attempt to see you again after that. He bade me tell you that he will keep his word to Miss Gordon, as he felt you would have him do; but he says that he must see you at once. You will not deny him that, Marian?"

There were tears in her eyes, and her lip quivered pitifully.

"Don't ask it," she whispered. Tell him to forgive me. Tell him that there is no one to blame but only the hideous circumstances that have surrounded us both. Tell him that I shall pray to God every night of my life to send him happiness, but I cannot see him. I have not the strength."

"Marian! Child!" exclaimed Underwood earnestly. "Think! How much has been given you today? Everything that you have asked of God! Think of June! The fault is not his. He is the most innocent victim of all. He loves you, and he is going out of the sunshine into the eternal shadow in order that he may keep his pledged word. You will believe me, and I believe that I know whereof I speak, when I tell you that June is not to blame. His engagement to Anne Gordon is not because he wished to hurt you. It was not done in a spirit of pique. It was the result of most unfortunate circumstances. I don't think you have the right to refuse to see him; but, even if you have, in pity, don't do it!"

There was a little pause between them. Her very soul was trembling with delight at the thought of meeting again the man whom she loved more than all the world, and yet loyalty to her friends made her think that it was wrong. Feeling that she could not decide for herself, she lifted her eyes at last, and answered in a low tone:

"You have been my good friend in all things. I owe all my happiness now to you, and you shall guide me in this as well. You wish me to see him?"

"I do, for June's sake."

"Then I will do it."

"That is right. At least, he deserves as much as that. You need not fear him, child. In all the world there is not a man more honorable than June Beckwith. I would trust him to the death, and beyond it."

"I do not fear him."

She said it simply, with her eyes upon his, and, leaning forward, Underwood touched her hair with his lips. She seemed an angel in her purity to him, and her sex was purified and glorified to him because of her.

"Good night," he said gently. "And God bless you!"

She did not turn away at once, but lifted his hand and kissed it.

"You are so good," she said brokenly. "If it were only possible that I could give her to you in exchange for what you have done for me, it seems to me that I would eternally thank God on my knees."

He smiled sadly.

"You cannot give me a heart, little one," he answered softly. "It is very late. Let us go now. You will need strength tomorrow to say—good by to June. Ah! little one, how can you do it when you shrink so from the word?"

"I shall find the courage—for his sake. Good night!"

She turned and left him then. At the head of the stairs she found her mother waiting. How strange it seemed to her as she put her arms about the slender waist and pronounced the word, and yet there was an infinite tenderness in it.

Mrs. Reade led her to her room where they were to pass the night together, and as the light fell upon Marian's face, she saw the tears on her cheeks, and, drawing the girl to her, kissed her.

"What has your good friend said to make my darling unhappy tonight?" she asked, seating herself and drawing the girl down beside her.

But Marian slipped to her knees, and for the first time since babyhood buried her head in her mother's lap, and for a few moments wept there in silence. Then when she could control her emotion sufficiently, she raised her head and dried her eyes.

"Are you sleepy?" she asked, with a little shadowy smile.

"No. I have slept for too many years to want to sleep now."

"Then will you listen to the story of my life?"

For answer, the mother drew her daughter closer and kissed her tenderly.

With those dears arms about her, Marian told it all—the story of June, of her grandmother's secret, of the robbery, and the last scene that had completed the dramatic climax.

It was late in the night when it was all finished; then, clasped closely in each other's arms, they went to bed and to sleep.

The shadow was still upon Marian's life, but mellowed by her recent good fortunes, until it seemed to her like a softened halo that had fallen about her. She asked God's blessing upon the lover whom she was to see the following day for the last time, and then slept more from exhaustion than anything else.

They were all up at an early hour the next day. Even Mr. and Mrs. Presbury seemed to absorb something of their excitement. There was little breakfast eaten, and it was with a feeling of greatest relief that they heard the carriage announced that was to take them back to town, for Mrs. Reade was to return with them.

Underwood took Marian's hand as she was about to leave the room, and in a low tone said to her:

"So much has been crowded into the last few days that I am as nervous as a woman. Somehow I have a premonition that this is to be one of the most eventful of all. I wonder what will have occurred before we sleep tonight?"

She turned a trifle pale before replying, then answered solemnly:

"We can only trust it all to God. I dare not think."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

JUNE'S ANGUISH.

It was not to Anne Gordon's home that Marian went on her return to the city. Much as she loved her old friend, she felt that she could not be quite free there, not as she had felt in the olden time, for there was June Beckwith still standing between them like the specter that would not be laid.

She could not go to see her old friend, with love for that friend's fiance so cruelly alive in her heart; but at least her friend could come to her, and after having reluctantly told the situation to Underwood, he decided that he would take her to his own home and place both her and her mother under the care of his housekeeper.

"There could be no exceptions taken to an arrangement like that," he said; and they agreed.

It was, therefore, to his own residence that they were driven, and when they were in the room to which the housekeeper had shown them, Marian asked for pen and paper, and hastily wrote the following note:

"MY NEVER-FAILING FRIEND: Mr. Underwood has told me of all your kindnesses to my grandmother. It is but another evidence to me of what an angel you are. I cannot express my gratitude. That is beyond words. But will you not come to me here, at Mr. Underwood's house, and bring my grandmother with you? I have that to tell you

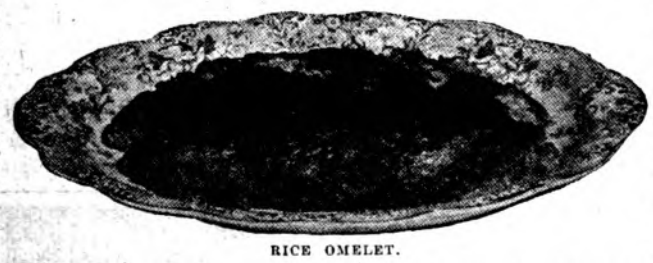
A HEALTH DIET FOR THE SUMMER MONTHS

By Violet Marsh

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

HOW to keep well during the heat of summer presents no less a problem than that of resisting the cold of winter. The fundamental requirement of each is a properly nourished body, and as warm weather approaches the diet must be rearranged to meet nature's own changes in the system. In summer the body loses a large amount of moisture through perspiration, which must be put back through the drinking of much water, and the eating of fruits, vegetables, milk, and other foods composed largely of water. One of the direct causes of constipation is lack of moisture in the body, brought about by not drinking sufficient water, and further aggravated by the use of cathartics which operate through drawing the water from the tissues.

In formulating a health program for the servantless women on the farms, who are mothers as well as housewives, it must be considered that the home duties keep them more closely tied during the summer months, for added to the routine housework is the canning, more milk to handle, more farm help, visitors, and the endless amount of cooking which it all entails.



PEANUT BRITTLE.

It is a conceded fact that hot weather slows down the digestion processes, and because of this the woman who works continually indoors, and on whose well-being depends that of her family, must so organize her cooking program that mental and physical rush will be eliminated, for thereby more will be accomplished and nervous indigestion avoided. With children as well as adults, loss of appetite in hot weather is usually the first warning that something is wrong with the digestion, and if right here the diet were attended to, many an attack of bowel disturbance would be avoided.

Generally speaking, the summer diet should consist of milk, cheese, eggs, fruit, vegetables, red meat not more than twice a week, lamb, fowl and fish each once a week, cereals and bread. Fats are necessary, which are best taken in the form of olive oil in salads, good butter and whole milk. Many find that sweet cream causes intestinal indigestion. Rich pies and puddings are harmful in summer. Eat all the raw vegetable salads possible, such as lettuce, tomato, celery and cabbage.

"Early to bed and early to rise" is absolutely essential to the summer program. Providing all are in good health, there should be no stragglers at the breakfast table, but all should eat together at one hour consistent with the various duties. This morning meal should be appetizing and nourishing, for the success of the day, health and good temper are greatly influenced by getting the right start. At this point the housewife is entitled to, and should take, a recess, a short time in which to relax out of doors before starting the dishwashing of the morning meal.

RICE OMELET.

Food Combinations for Summer

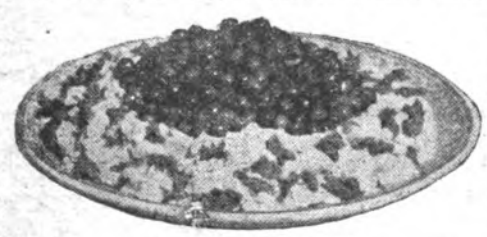
The heavy meal of the day is better taken at noon, which allows of a simple supper at night. A good, old-fashioned bowl of bread and milk is an excellent restorative at the end of a hard day's work. Most children like it, and it makes a good emergency supper when it is late or too hot for a fire. When milk is abundantly taken, meat should not be eaten at the same meal. Milk contains fat, casein, albumen, sugar and minerals, either suspended or in solution, and the tendency to think of milk as a beverage rather than as an important food comes partly, no doubt, from the fact that it is a liquid.

CHOWDERS are a very acceptable means of serving milk. Made in the proportion of two cups of milk, one cup of finely-cut raw potato, one sliced onion, seasoned with butter, pepper and salt, and slightly thickened with finely-rolled cracker-crumbs, a nutritive and palatable dish is obtained. One cup of sweet corn may be added just long enough before serving to again bring the chowder to a boil. Add sufficient milk to give the right amount of liquid. Milk gravies may be made in various combinations, and when thickened with flour and enriched with butter may be served with potatoes or other vegetables, or poured over toast. Hard-boiled eggs cut fine or grated cheese may be added.

SOUR CREAM whipped, sweetened and flavored with nutmeg makes a delicious sauce for boiled rice, sponge cake or to eat with sweet berries. As sour cream turns to butter very quickly, care must be taken not to beat it too long.

COTTAGE CHEESE.—In families where milk is abundant, cottage cheese should be made an important food, especially in summer. It is very simply made by putting the clabber into a large shallow pan, and into it stirring boiling water. Set the pan into another larger one containing boiling water. Stir occasionally and when quite warm test by rubbing a little in the hand. The curd should never reach the stage of forming into a mass, but must be only thickened to a creamy consistency. Dish carefully into a thin muslin bag and hang two hours to drip. Remove from bag and work in salt and a little heavy cream.

The second way to make cream cheese is simply to put the clabber into a bag and hang it in the sun to drip and "make." This process makes an excellent cheese, which can be digested by very weak stomachs. Flavor as above.



Cheese being a concentrated food, many find it more or less constipating, so that it becomes necessary to eat plenty of fruit and vegetables to obtain the proper food balance. If the family does not at first take kindly to these home-made cheeses, a taste for them may be acquired through combinations, of which there are many. All the fruit salads are improved by adding cottage cheese. By plentifully spreading the cheese between thin slices of bread to be eaten with a dish of lightly sweetened berries or other fruit a delicious supper is prepared that can be served out-of-doors and much work saved. Cream cheese beaten up with jam and thickly spread over a thin shortcake is an appetizing combination.

MACARONI constitutes an excellent food that is enjoyed by most people. First cooked in boiling salted water, but not too long, then baked either in a cream or tomato sauce, combined with cheese, makes a well-balanced meal when served with plenty of string beans or green peas. Cooked in this way macaroni may be warmed over without injuring the flavor. Good bread and well-cooked cereals can always be on hand with which to make the foundation of many a hot weather meal. Quick breads that require a hot oven should be baked in the early morning.

Miscellaneous Recipes

RICE OMELET.—Boil rice in plenty of salted water so that the kernels will be separate. Drain. Beat three egg yolks until very creamy, add three dessertspoons of cold water, two cups of cold rice, one scant tablespoon of sugar, season with pepper and salt. Stir until well blended, then add the egg whites beaten stiff. Pour into a buttered frying-pan that is not too hot. Work around the edges with a knife and when the omelet begins to get firm, place the pan in a moderate oven and finish cooking. Butter generously, fold once and turn onto a platter. Top with slices of jelly.

PEAS WITH POTATO PUFF. Beat one-half cup of hot milk into two cups of freshly-mashed potato until very light. Add two well-beaten eggs, one cup of cooked ham cut into small pieces, and one-half teaspoon of salt. Beat again, spread in a thick ring on a serving dish and place in a hot oven until well puffed. Heap with peas and serve at once.

PEAS WITH POTATO PUFF.

POTATO SALAD.—Mince one onion, a few sprigs of parsley and as much again tender celery, stir, sprinkle with salt and pepper, press down with a plate and let the mixture stand one hour. Boil with the jackets on five medium-size potatoes. Cool without peeling, then dice and mix with the onion and celery. Over the whole pour a little good salad oil and sprinkle with lemon juice. Toss, spread on a bed of lettuce leaves and serve.

MACARONI.—A good quality of macaroni is always of a yellowish color. Boiled macaroni increases about four times in size. Boil in a large amount of water with one level teaspoon of salt to every quart. Add macaroni to water when it is boiling rapidly. The time of cooking varies somewhat, but when a piece cuts easily pressed against the side of kettle it is done. Drain through a colander and plunge at once into cold water, then drain. This prevents the macaroni becoming sticky. To bake macaroni, prepare as follows: Make a white sauce from butter, flour and milk. Put the macaroni into a baking dish in layers, each layer being spread with the sauce and a sprinkling of grated dairy cheese. When the dish is full, sprinkle with fine bread-crumbs, dot with butter, lightly sprinkle with grated nutmeg and bake in a moderately hot oven until the crumbs are brown (see illustration in picture at top of page).

MEXICAN HAM.—Cut a slice of ham one inch thick, and rub into it one tablespoon of brown sugar mixed wih half a teaspoon of mustard. Lay in the bottom of a baking dish that can be covered. Pare and slice thin enough potatoes to cover the ham to a depth of three inches, sprinkle with pepper and add strips of fat ham unless there is a good rim of fat around the edges of slice. Cover with fresh milk and bake two hours in a moderate oven.

KOUMISS.—One cake of compressed yeast dissolved in one cup of lukewarm water. Add to this two level teaspoons of brown sugar and three cups of fresh milk. Shake all together and fill bottles or glass jars about two-thirds full and seal. A good strong top is necessary as the pressure of fermentation is very great. Keep in a warm place, shaking several minutes every three hours. When this is done, securely wrap the jars in a towel. The koumiss is "made" when it separates in the jars. Keep two or more days before using.

JUNKET.—Crush one junket tablet and stir it into two cups of lukewarm milk. Add one-fourth cup of sugar, one-eighth teaspoon of salt, a few grains of nutmeg or cinnamon and pour into one large or several small dishes to harden in a warm place, then remove to cooler place.

STRAWBERRY SHERBET.—Hull one quart of strawberries, cover with one and one-fourth cup of sugar, let stand one hour, then crush and squeeze through a double thickness of cheese-cloth. There should be about two cups of juice. Add to this one cup of water, and one dessert-spoon of lemon juice. Freeze in the usual way, remove dasher, and stir in the stiffly-beaten white of one egg. Pack in salt and ice and let it stand two hours.

RICE CAKES WITH STRAWBERRY SAUCE.—Beat one cup of well-cooked rice until smooth. When cool add one tablespoon of melted butter, two well-beaten eggs and three-fourths cup of sweet milk. Add one cup of sifted flour sifted again with three teaspoons of baking powder and one-half teaspoon of salt. Beat hard and cook on a hot griddle. Make the sauce as follows: Cream one-third cup of butter, slowly add one cup of powdered sugar, then the white of one egg beaten stiff, and one cup of mashed strawberries. Beat well together and serve.

PEANUT BRITTLE.—Boil two cups of brown sugar, one cup of corn syrup and one cup of water until a little tested in cold water will become brittle. Add butter the size of a walnut and half a pound of peanuts roasted and shelled, and pour at once into a thin sheet to cool.

STRAWBERRY PRESERVE.—Wash berries and thoroughly drain. Take an equal weight of granulated sugar. Hull the berries, putting all the soft and bruised ones in a separate dish. Mash these, add a little water, and cook them ten minutes, or until the juice is drawn out. Strain. By measure there should be three times as much sugar as juice, which amount can be made up by the addition of water. Boil juice and sugar ten minutes, or until it is thick. Into the boiling syrup drop a few whole strawberries at a time and cook slowly until clear. Skim out and put into a sterilized jar. When the fruit is all cooked, unless the juice is thick, boil it a little longer and pour it over the preserve. Seal.

STRAWBERRY AND PINEAPPLE MARMALADE.—Shred the pineapple; hull and wash the berries. Use equal parts, and to each quart use three cups of sugar. Cook all together very slowly about one hour, or until thick.

Stella Rosevelt

continued, with a smile, "that there are two years' income to be disposed of in some way, and I am only making up lost time. I like to go about the world, and I like to go in style, as I told you once before, and so my heiress must help me keep up appearances."

"Are you sure you are doing just right, Uncle Jacob, in giving me all your money?" Star asked, hesitatingly, after a few minutes of thoughtful silence, while she watched the sunlight play among her new treasures.

"To whom should I give it, I should like to know?" he questioned, bluntly.

"But I have no legal claim upon you, and you have relatives. I'm afraid it will make trouble——"

"No, it won't; I've taken care of that, I can assure you," he interrupted. "My will is made, signed and sealed, and in the hands of one of the best lawyers in the city. You are to have the whole of my fortune, excepting what the law demands for blood. I've given a dollar to each of them, just to clear myself and keep them from breaking my will; and they'll never get another red cent," he concluded, with more asperity than she had ever seen him betray before.

"I'm afraid you are piling a mountain upon my small shoulders," Star said, with a little laugh.

"It is a mountain which I shall take care won't crush you; and, besides, I hope to help you bear it for a good many years to come, if my health keeps on improving as it has done during the last few months; and then, I reckon, it will not be very difficult to find some one else who would be willing to take a share of the burden," Mr. Rosevelt concluded, shyly.

Star flushed, and then her face grew sad.

She knew that he meant she would find suitors for her hand; but she could not forget her first love, and she knew that she should never meet another who would win the place in her heart which she had given to Archibald Sherbrooke, unworthy as she believed him to be of it.

That evening Miss Meredith and her brother called.

"How fortunate that you came tonight," Star said to the young lady during their conversation. "You would have missed us if you had waited longer, for tomorrow we go to Newport for a few weeks."

"Do you? That is delightful, for we have our rooms engaged there, also, for next week, and intend to remain a month," Miss Meredith returned, with evident pleasure, while Mr. Ralph Meredith, who was conversing with Mr. Rosevelt, but with one ear open toward the young ladies, felt a sudden heartthrob at the intelligence.

"Newport is very gay this summer, I am told," Miss Meredith continued. "'Everybody,' so to speak, is there, and it is one of the most charming places in the world to visit. Have you ever been there, Miss Gladstone?"

"No," Star answered. "I have been so busy with my studies ever since I came to this country, that I have not been anywhere."

"Since you came to this country!" Grace Meredith repeated. "Are you not an American?"

"No; I am an English girl, and it will be two years in November since I left merrie England."

"Are you some lady of high degree, come here to get your education? I am almost inclined to think so," laughed her friend, bending an admiring glance upon Star's beautiful face.

"No, indeed. Don't go to weaving any romances about me," she answered, flushing slightly, "for I am only plain Star Gladstone."

"But 'plain Star Gladstone' belongs to a very good family, nevertheless," interrupted Mr. Rosevelt, who had overheard the latter part of their conversation, and would not allow Star to depreciate herself.

"Miss Gladstone is the loveliest girl I have ever met, and you wouldn't let me get a word in edgewise with her, Grace," Ralph Meredith said, in a grieved tone, after they left the house.

"Are you 'star' struck so soon, brother mine? You'll have opportunities enough to 'get your words in' widthways during the next few weeks, and you can comfort yourself for your disappointment to night with the thought that I was paving the way to glory for you," laughed his sister.

"Were you not surprised to learn that she is English?" she asked, thoughtfully.

"Yes, rather; for I have been told that English girls are not very pretty; but she is wonderfully beautiful."

"What will you wager that she does not turn out to be some lady of high degree?"

"Pshaw! Grace, you are always imagining some unlikely story or other. You should not read so many novels. Don't put her entirely beyond our reach, if you please. It is quite enough for the present to know that she is Mr. Rosevelt's heiress and the author of that charming little book, without being some princess in disguise," returned the young man, somewhat impatiently.

"I think I shall like Miss Meredith," Star said, musingly, to Mr. Rosevelt, when their visitors were gone.

"She appears to be a very agreeable young lady. I should like you to form some pleasant friendship," the old gentleman returned; then, with a keen glance, he asked: "How are you pleased with her brother?"

"He is quite entertaining."

"Very fine-looking young man; don't you think so?"

"Is he?—yes—rather," was the absent reply; for speaking of England had sent Star's thoughts across the ocean again, where she saw in imagination a noble, patrician face, with dark, fathomless eyes, and curling chestnut hair; for Archibald Sherbrooke—she could never think of him in any other character—was her ideal of all that was manly and grand.

CHAPTER XXVI.

"WHAT DOES THIS MEAN?"

Newport was teeming with all that was gay, beautiful and attractive during this particular season of which we write.

Never had so much wealth and luxury been represented there, or so many elegant equipages seen driving through the streets or along the smooth, sweeping beach.

Not the least attractive among these equipages was the light and airy, though costly, phaeton of "Mr. Rosevelt's ward," with its embroidered lap robes, its luxurious velvet-cushioned seats, its plump, sleek and spirited gray ponies in their gold-mounted harnesses.

Star had created quite a sensation when she arrived at the hotel where they had taken rooms; and the tall, distinguished old gentleman, with such silvery hair and beard, and who appeared so devoted to her, was scarcely less a target for all eyes. But when it began to be whispered that Miss Gladstone was not only the heiress of Jacob Rosevelt, the millionaire, but also the authoress of that bright little book which for a year had created such a sensation in New York circles, the excitement increased, and everybody was on the qui vive to obtain an introduction.

When, on the second evening after her arrival, she came into the great parlors of the hotel—for there was to be a grand hop or assembly there that night—leaning on Mr. Rosevelt's arm, and looking "so divinely fair" in her shimmering robe of cream-colored silk and mistlike tulle, garnished with velvet-leaved, golden-hearted pansies, her shining hair coiled like a crown about her small head, with a cluster of pansies nestling lovingly among its glossy plaits, every eye was attracted by her loveliness, and everybody—of the masculine gender, at least—was ready to "rave over" her, "swear by" her, and "fight for" her if need be.

She was whisked away to the ballroom, and the evening sped like a vision of delight.

She had been taught to dance at home, notwithstanding the fact that her father was a clergyman, for in all English homes dancing is considered a necessary accomplishment, because it imparts ease and grace to the manners of the young.

Mr. Rosevelt followed, for he enjoyed looking upon the merry dancers, and taking up his station near a window, and by a stand of flowers where he was partially shielded from observation, he watched his pet with a fond smile upon his lips, proud of her beauty, proud of her intelligence and of the admiration she was attracting.

While standing here, a group of half a dozen ladies and gentlemen gathered near him, and he overheard a conversation which amused him, and caused at the same time something of a feeling of triumph to pervade his heart.

"Have you seen the new arrivals?" asked a gentleman of one of his companions.

"No; what new arrivals do you refer to? There are many every day."

"An old codger from New York—rich as a king, they say—and his ward, who bids fair to be the beauty of the season."

"Indeed!" returned the lady, assuming a piqued tone. "How dare you make such an assertion, and in the presence of three acknowledged beauties, too?"

"I beg pardon if I have offended," the gentleman rougishly replied; "but—I have had Washingtonian instructions regarding the principle of truth."

The young lady tapped him playfully upon the arm with her fan, while she remarked, significantly:

"How glad I am that you have told me of it!" whereupon the whole party joined in a laugh at the "truthful" gentleman's expense.

"But about this fair charmer," the lady pursued; "who is she, and what is the name of this 'old codger' who is 'rich as a king'?"

"The lady's name is Miss Gladstone, and she is not only beautiful, charming and rich, but is also the author of 'Chatsworth's Pride,' which you have doubtless read."

"Oh! a bluestocking!" cried the gay girl, with well-affected horror; and just here another voice chimed in—a voice which made Mr. Rosevelt start and listen more intently:

"Miss Gladstone! How strange I never heard the author's name before! There was only a simple star upon the title-page where the author's name should have been. Mamma!" in a startled tone, as if a strange idea had suddenly come into the speaker's mind, "it cannot possibly be Stella Gladstone, can it?"

"Certainly not," returned Mrs. Richards—for both she and Josephine were among the group referred to, having come from a neighboring hotel to attend the hop. "Such a thing cannot be possible; she could not write a book."

The woman spoke contemptuously, and yet the utterance of that name produced an uneasy sensation in her mind.

"What is the gentleman's name? Whose ward did you say she is?" she asked, a moment later, thinking that would throw some light on the subject.

"I declare I have forgotten," the gentleman returned; "it's a high-sounding name, though, and he is an aristocratic-looking old fellow, too. By the way, Miss Richards," he continued, turning to the young lady, "I am willing to wager a handsome fan against a new pair of gloves that Miss Gladstone's phaeton and pair of ponies will be the envy of every lady in Newport, for a more trappy turn-out I've never seen in my life."

"Then she drives her own ponies, does she? Well, I must say you have aroused my curiosity to the highest notch, and I'd like to see this paragon of perfection, Mr. Pendleton," Josephine said, a feeling of jealousy springing up in her heart at hearing another's praises sounded so profusely.

"You can be gratified, for there she stands now," replied Mr. Pendleton, drawing her attention to the spot where Star stood surrounded by an admiring crowd.

Her back was turned toward them, and they could not judge of her beauty; but they saw a tall, willowy figure in trailing robes of exceeding richness, a stately head crowned with golden hair, and there was a familiarity something about the fair stranger which made both mother and daughter look more closely, while their eyes were filled with anxious foreboding.

"She is elegantly dressed, I must confess," Josephine said, putting up her glass to get a better view of the "belle of the evening;" "and, mamma," she added, in a lower tone, "is it my imagination, or is there something really familiar in that figure? Can it be Stella?"

"Impossible! What could have put such a foolish notion into your head? Where in the world could she get money enough to flourish in such style?" Mrs. Richards retorted, impatiently.

Money in Bee Stings

By Sam E. Conner

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

PRODUCING honey is not the only way in which bee keeping may be made profitable, as Mrs. S. H. Stockman of East Auburn, Maine, has proved. Rarely does she have more than two colonies of bees, yet her returns each year from them is greater than when she sold the honey from forty or fifty colonies; you see, instead of selling honey she now sells the stings.

This Maine woman has kept bees for more than forty years. Up to a quarter of a century ago her interest in bees, as a business venture, was confined to their honey-producing abilities. In this she was successful, the annual output being about a ton of honey. The largest single year's production which Mrs. Stockman ever recorded was twenty-two hundred and fifty pounds. Twenty-five years ago she became interested in the other side of the bee industry; that of selling their stings. She very quickly found that there was more money and less work in stings than in honey. Since that time she has devoted her energies to stings.

Mrs. Stockman's customers are the large manufacturing druggists of the country and they buy an average of fifty thousand bee stings from her each year. They would take more, but Mrs. Stockman does all the work herself and this is all she can handle. The fact that the demand is greater than the supply shows this to be one field of endeavor for the woman upon the farm which has not been overcrowded.

From the bee stings the purest formic acid is secured. Each sting contains a small drop of the acid, which is in much demand for the treatment of certain diseases.

The equipment for this business of producing bee stings is not elaborate. Having the colony or two of bees which are necessary, all else needed is a bench by a window, a powerful reading glass, pair of fine-pointed tweezers, a small dish filled with sugar of milk and a can full of soapsuds. With this simple outfit one is ready to draw the stings from thousands of busy bees.

Having secured from one of her bee colonies a sufficient number of bees for the time she proposes to work, Mrs. Stockman goes to her bench. The room is darkened by drawing the shades of all windows except the one at which she labors. This done, the box in which the bee stock has been collected is opened, given a slight shake and out come the bees. The light from the unshaded window attracts them and they cluster on the glass or screen. With her left hand Mrs. Stockman reaches forth and picks up a bee. Why don't they sting her? Easiest thing in the world to answer: She takes them by the head and not by the sting part of their anatomy. This, so she says, is very simple after you learn the trick. Having captured the bee, she holds it under the glass, which magnifies it several times, and draws the sting with the tweezers. Immediately the sting is dropped into the sugar of milk, which forms a coating of it and prevents souring. The bee is dropped into the soapsuds, which kills it, as once the sting has been removed a bee is of no further use in the world.

These stings are shipped in glass bottles holding five hundred and are sent by parcel post, so that Mrs. Stockman does not have to leave her own dooryard in carrying on the business.

During the quarter of a century which she has been engaged in this business, Mrs. Stockman has drawn more than a million bee stings. Her largest day's work was when she took fifteen hundred stings. The best record which she ever established was on September 17, 1918, when in three hours she deprived a thousand bees of their stings.

While she is frequently stung, the wounds have never been serious, and this occurs much less frequently than would be supposed. The only time, says Mrs. Stockman, when the bees sting her is when she grows careless and does not pay attention to the work; when she gets to thinking of other matters connected with the farm and unthinkingly picks a bee up by the wrong end. "It is my fault, always," says she, "and not because of the bees being ugly."

Tried As By Fire

considered foolhardy but the great majority of the better thinking people looked upon him as a hero.

The newspapers had spread the word broadcast and the parsonage was flooded with letters and telegrams, all containing words of praise and sympathy for the man who was brave enough to face the possibilities of illness and perhaps death in a most horrible form, in order to carry comfort and cheer to two stricken girls.

To Gordon Armstrong, alone in his study, the ringing of the church bells brought a feeling of sadness.

"How I wish I could be in my pulpit," he thought, "but as much as my people love me there would be a general stampede if I so much as appeared at the church door."

On his library shelves were a number of medical books. Unwisely he delved into article after article on smallpox until his whole mind was obsessed with the idea that he was sickening with the dread disease. Wednesday evening his courage almost failed him as he crept into bed with aching back, throbbing head and taut nerves.

For what seemed hours he lay awake, thinking—thinking—thinking. Life seemed so bright—the future so promising—and then there came before him a picture of Myra Livingstone as he had seen her last in health—and then the picture changed and Myra's eyes looked at him from an unfamiliar pain-distorted face.

Was he dreaming or did he once again hear her voice—faint but sweet—as she thanked him for his visit to her sister and herself.

At last his tense muscles relaxed and he fell into a sweet sleep. When he awoke, refreshed, the sun was brightly shining and the memory of the night before was like a bad dream. Realizing that medical books were poor companions for days of "waiting and watching," he determined to set his mind on sermonizing.

Strangely enough, his mind seemed to focus on the text, "Go forward" (Ex. 14:15). Those who heard him deliver the sermon his first Sabbath out of quarantine, united in saying that it was the strongest message he had ever delivered from the pulpit of the Memorial church.

Anxious, weary days as well as bright happy ones must pass in the making of the year, and when the Sabbath before "Conference" broke, bright and clear, Gordon Armstrong was in perfect accord with the day. For him the dark, trying days of exile were at an end and once more he was at liberty to preach to his dear people.

Long before the time for service the crowd began to pour into the Memorial church. As Mr. Armstrong entered, the pent-up emotions of the great audience found expression in "Praise God From Whom All Blessings Flow." There was not a dry eye in the company; men and women and children sobbed aloud.

Reaching the pulpit, Mr. Armstrong tried to speak but could not; then, suddenly, completely overwhelmed by this expression of love on the part of his people, he bowed his head on the old Bible and wept like a little child.

At the close of the service old and young pressed forward to take him by the hand. A hush fell over the company as through the crowd came a tall, black-robed figure, shaken with emotion. It was Mrs. Livingstone.

In a voice scarcely audible she said: "Mr. Armstrong, can you ever forgive me for my bitter opposition to you? You've touched my heart very deeply by your kindness to me and mine. You risked your life to"—her voice broke—"how can I ever show my gratitude?"

It was the closing session of the annual M. E. Conference. All interest was centering upon the reading of the appointments. Much to the annoyance of the Memorial Committee, two city churches were insisting upon having the Rev. Gordon Armstrong appointed as their pastor. The district superintendent would promise nothing as Mr. Armstrong had only been appointed to Plainsburg to fill an unexpired term of another man.

As the bishop stepped to the front of the platform with the fateful paper in his hand, a silence that could be felt fell upon the vast audience. The future of more than two hundred men and churches was hanging in the balance.

"Who will be our pastor?"—"Where am I going?"

As "Memorial Church—Gordon Armstrong" was announced a quickly-suppressed hand-clapping from the Plainsburg delegates testified to their delight over the appointment. Their beloved pastor-friend would be with them for at least another year.

The next five years were busy happy ones for Gordon Armstrong. His coveted degree from the university had been won and a beautiful new church edifice had taken the place of the old weather-stained structure where he had preached his initial sermon.

In the recess at the back of the pulpit was a magnificent pipe organ, a gift from Mrs. Livingstone in memory of her dead daughter, Elsa.

When Mrs. Livingstone first spoke about installing the organ she expressed the wish that it might be put in as an expression of her gratitude to Mr. Armstrong, but the matter coming to the notice of the preacher he called to see her and insisted that he would appreciate her gift doubly if the organ were made a memorial for Elsa, and when the church was dedicated the "Memorial Organ" was presented by the pastor in a few well-chosen words. His reference to the dead girl was touching in the extreme.

Many changes had taken place in the membership of the church. Several of the "Old Guard" had been mustered out and many new faces were seen at the Sunday services. The pastor, now "Dr." Armstrong, preached every Sabbath to audiences that taxed the seating capacity even of the new structure.

At the Livingstone home on Euclid Boulevard, Dr. Armstrong had become a welcome visitor. Just a month before "Conference," the town papers had published in the society column the announcement: "Mrs. Livingstone announces the engagement of her daughter, Myra, to Rev. Gordon Armstrong, Ph. D., pastor of the Memorial M. E. church. The marriage will take place in the near future."

At the parsonage the ladies were busy superintending the laying of new rugs and the placing of newly-purchased furniture. Dr. Armstrong watched the work of renovating with peculiar interest for the home was being prepared for the reception of his bride.

Glorious with sunshine was their wedding day. The Memorial church was crowded to the doors a full hour before the time set for the ceremony.

The strains of the old familiar wedding march hushed the hum of voices and focused all eyes upon the opening door at the rear of the church.

Attired in a simple suit of tailored grey and leaning upon the arm of the man she loved, Myra Livingstone passed up the long aisle to the altar. It was a simple service but an impressive one.

As the officiating bishop pronounced them "husband and wife" and they knelt for the final prayer, the organ, Elsa's Memorial, sounded forth, softly, almost caressingly, the opening bars of the beautiful wedding hymn, "Oh, Heart of Love," and from the choir loft behind the pulpit was wafted down in sweetest melody:

"Oh, Heart of Love, Thou Lord of Life and King,
This day of plighted troth, by hand and ring
Crown Thou, we pray, with Thine own hallowing,
Dear Heart of Love.
Oh, Heart of Love! In this their golden hour
On these, made one in Thee, Thy blessings pour,
The three-fold benedictions of Thy dower,
Dear Heart of Love."

Five years ago that day Elsa had passed out from her suffering into rest. Myra and Gordon in the midst of their happiness had not forgotten. As they knelt for the final prayer, almost unconsciously Gordon's clasp on the hand resting so confidently in his tightened as he thanked God that Myra, his wife, had been spared to crown his life with joy and happiness.

At "The Elms," the home of the bride, a simple wedding breakfast was served for the members of the two families only.

The wedding gifts were numerous and costly but nothing received more attention than a small, exquisitely framed painting. Its very oddity was its charm—a full-blown crimson rose half concealed by a bit of rare old lace. No card was attached and when Gordon saw it first he turned to his mother and teasingly queried: "Who lost the card this time?"

Then turning to Myra, who was standing near the gift table, he took her hand and placing it in that of his mother he whispered tenderly: "Mother, this is our Rose—a genuine American Beauty—love her as you love your boy."

At an early hour in the afternoon the young couple left for their trip which was to end at "Conference."

"Tried as by Fire" and proving true—faithful in the performance of duty, however hard—with such a record behind him, Gordon Armstrong entered into his new life full of well-deserved joy and gladness.

All nature seemed to rejoice with them as, amid the waving of handkerchiefs and showered by rice, they said "good by" to the dear home friends.

The old sexton of the church had asked as a special favor that he be notified at what hour Brother Armstrong and his bride would leave the town, and so as the train pulled out of the station the chiming of the church bells fell upon their ears, and as Myra, through a veil of happy tears, looked at her husband she softly whispered: "Old bells,

"'Ring out the Old,
Ring in the New,
Ring, Happy Bells, across the years.'"

The Child at the Family Table

By Mary B. Tyrrell

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

EVEN a very small child may be taught patience, courtesy and self-restraint at the family table, and if he is a nuisance at mealtimes when he is three or four years old, we may safely conclude that the effort to teach him good table manners a few months earlier was lacking.

If the children are fed at the family table some special consideration must be given to the menu. There are some vegetables of special food value for the children, because of their mineral content, carrots or spinach, for example, which in some households do not appear on the table because the older members of the family do not care for them. The grownups will gain in health if they put forth an effort to eat these things with seeming relish, and in so doing will help to train the children to a wider range of diet.

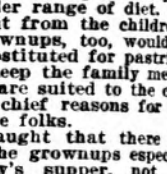
Rich desserts must be cut from the children's diet, and no doubt the grownups, too, would be better off if fruits were substituted for pastries; but it is not necessary to keep the family menus restricted to such foods as are suited to the children, which is one of the chief reasons for the separate meals for the little folks.

Children can soon be taught that there are some things that are for the grownups especially. "Meat is for Daddy's supper, not for 'Gene's," said a small boy cheerfully, at the dinner table. The child is less likely to ask for helpings from the family diet, if the special food he should have is served to him attractively, on his own pretty dishes, and if he is made to feel that he has the privilege of "treats." The little lad who must not eat radishes is quite willing to "trade" the forbidden food for an extra helping of his favorite rhubarb.

The nursery table seldom has the oversight that prevents bad table manners, and if there are several children to eat together, each one may acquire some disgusting trick and impart it to the others.

The patience and firmness needed to correct the outcroppings of the first bad manners is seldom exercised at a separate table (out of sight, out of mind), and it is far more difficult to teach the children to eat properly if the presence of their elders is lacking.

In the matter of table conversation, the idea that "children should be seen and not heard" is a relic of the dark ages. All the educational effort of today is to draw out the child's powers of self-expression, and if he is taught to do this in his school, and forbidden to do it at home, the first step has been taken to alienate him, as too often happens, from the family life, and lead him to feel more freedom and happiness away from his parents than when with them.



The child may sit at the table and talk at the table without being over-boisterous or obstreperous. Surely it is no less rude for the parents to repress their child for their own selfish convenience than it is for him to interrupt them to make his opinions known.

Mutual courtesy, which the child must learn from his parents, will settle the question as to how much the child should be allowed to talk at the table, but the policy of repression, too often followed, makes for a self-consciousness, sometimes an unpleasantness of disposition, that may persist for years and do much to mar the life all through youth and even in the years beyond.

JUNE is June! There is no other month like the prime of the year. All the promise of Spring is now finding fulfilment, and even when I cannot get to where woods are, I know that the foliage is reaching toward the flush, its green fresh and undimmed by dust and drouth that may come with the later heat.

Billy, who has the advantage of being able to enjoy Nature both externally and internally, is thoroughly happy these days and is out-of-doors more than ever. Meanwhile the dust gathers over his set of Macaulay, and neglected letters, which he has failed to absorb, threaten to overflow the room where I work. Perhaps it is being out in the park and streets so much that has caused Billy to become even more of an observer and critic than his naturally censorious temperament demands. Or perhaps it is but the stimulus of being fed with the pros and cons of young folks' ways which Cousin Gus Trick and Cousin Jack Wilcox have diffused through the letters of our League—but, whatever it may be, the fact stands that Billy has lately taken to making stinging remarks concerning the "flippers" and "flappers" he has met during his sidewalk strolls and his lawn-luncheons in Prospect Park.

"Uncle Lisha," said he, seriously, as he came in yesterday; "I must say I think something is radically wrong with young people nowadays. The boys don't want to work any harder than is necessary to puff a cigarette and carry around a pair of polka-dotted shoes, and the style of dressing with girls seems to have reached the limit—to say nothing of the way they try to decorate their faces. It really makes me discouraged to watch 'em, Uncle. What's to blame? —the war, the movies, or who or what?" And Bill stared gloomily and questioningly at me, gritting his teeth ominously as he regarded the mountain range of letters in front of my desk.

"Billy," I answered, "for the sake of June, do not begin one of your reform-rampaging arguments. It is too lovely a day to dispense awful prophecies, and besides see how busy I am! Now please to get to work on some of these letters and do not fret so much about the wildness of present-day youngsters you have been seeing on Fulton Street, Broadway and Flatbush Avenue. Time will take care of 'em and teach 'em sense—even if their mothers and fathers do not."

"But, Uncle Lisha," pleaded Billy, looking at me reproachfully; "you never say a word about it. Why, if you had seen some of the things that I have!" And here Billy paused, and rolled his eyes until his bushy, fuzzy eyebrows made such strange undulations that I had to hold up a letter before my face to hide my grins.

But Billy was not to be fooled.

"That's right, Uncle Lisha," he exclaimed wrathfully. "Go ahead and laugh!" You laugh at everything. I tell you this is a serious matter. Why, the papers and magazines are full of the way young folks are dressing and carrying-on these days. If you don't notice it, others do."

"Bill," I replied, aroused at last; "never fear but what I notice just as much as you do—and read more, too. But I may think differently about what I read and notice. You or anyone else would have a hard time making me believe that young people today are all headed for the bow-wows, and have so much more of evil in hearts, dress and manners than in past history. Youth is always youth, Thank Heaven!—and age is always age. You are not so old, Bill; but you are ancient enough to be "agin" young folks most of the while, and not with 'em or part of 'em. Youth expresses itself in different ways in our time than in the past, but from the same effervescent instincts and with no worse motives. We may have the "toddle" and not the waltz or two-step; joy rides instead of buggy excursions. Boys may be safety-razored and not whiskered, and our girls bobbed-haired and not long-curled—but they are the same boys and girls as ever. Careless of age or what age may think, they go their ways; looking always with eager inexperienced eyes toward a future that is theirs and not a past that is Experience's. To change these things you have got to change Youth itself, Billy, and I don't think even you will want to try that!

"But you are right, Bill, in saying the world of print is filled today with more or less unkind criticism of youth—with the innocent "flapper" getting the hardest digs from those who are quite certain nothing so dreadful and silly in young girlhood was ever seen before. But the reason that most of these criticisms fail of wisdom, sympathy and justness is that the makers of them err in not looking backward to their own early days. And this is just where bewildered parents often err, too. There are foolish parents as well as foolish boys and girls, and the mistakes of fathers and mothers, well-meant though they be, are sometimes as serious in their effects as the sins and follies of over-exuberant youth. There are parents, for instance, who bring too little authority to bear, and others who exert too much; and they end by losing their children's love and the right to guide them because they have failed to find youth's viewpoint. And they have to do this, for youth can never find nor assume the point of view of an older generation. They are forever separate. The leading of youth wisely and with love is a difficult task. It can only be handled by "looking backward" and gaining in this way an adjustment to the minds and hearts of those who are starting the adventure of life. If we do not, or cannot accomplish this backward looking, we have no chance of dealing sympathetically, of judging clearly, of criticising justly. Youth will brush our advice and criticism carelessly aside and go flipping and flapping on in glad and foolish way.

"I sincerely believe, Billy, you old grumbler, that the jeremiads of you and others concerning present-day young people are more than exaggerated in prophecy and lamentation. The "flapper" existed in ancient Thebes and Alexandria and has been with us in varied and often lovely form through the later centuries. Let her still preen her young wings in happy, foolish fashion and wear her feathers as she will. It is a way of youth which is as old as the earth. Why not turn rather to some of the cheerful signs of the young generation? The young men of the past, for instance, dressed even more flightily and smoked and drank more than our boys of today. Booze has received a death blow and is dying with horrible groanings, and tobacco's smoky grip will be loosened somewhat before long, too. For all narcotics must go, banned by the spread of knowledge and by our weakened race's instinct toward self-preservation. Those who attack the manner of dress of our modern girls forget that with all its defects it is really more healthful and sensible than in the past. Look at old fashion books, Bill, and find this out. The worst fault is in tottering-heeled shoes, but the growing use of rubber-soled sport footwear is the saving grace here.

"Streaks of red and black have no place on the clean faces of young girls, Billy, and I'm with you there as far as you want to go in your kicking. These efforts at adornment fail of all purpose. They are barbaric and ugly. The natural functioning of the skin is injured and the youthful texture ruined forever. Here is where mothers must come in and take a strong hand when other advice fails.

"I'm for our youth today, Bill, and I'm for them strong. They are the last-comers and the world belongs to them. I believe they will make a better place of it than it can be made by you continuing doleful grumbling on June days."

I looked hard at Billy, but I don't believe he heard a word of the last part of my almost-lecture. He was reading a six-page, green note-papered letter from a girl in Colorado—and he was grinning broadly as he turned the closely-written sheets. All his worries of "flippers" and "flappers" were forgotten. Billy does not always remember, but I do, that there would not be so many grins in life for all of us, so much of singing, so much of beauty, if it were not for the youth of this old world.

And now for the letters:

MADISON, MAINE.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I have attempted to write to the Cousins' Corner many times and have torn up the letter each time. It is seldom I see one from Maine and I wonder why? Surely there are scores of Maine cousins who can write interesting letters!

How many of the cousins are school teachers? I have been teaching for two years in a rural school, two miles from home. Here, in the rural schools, there are three ten week terms a year. My first two terms this year I taught without a vacation between and the third term will begin in time to close about the middle of June. You may smile, if you like, but please don't laugh, when I tell you that I have only seven pupils! Even though the number is small, I have the following grades: first, second, third, fifth and seventh. In the golden days last autumn, the children and I enjoyed being out of doors what time we could, gathering nuts and bright-colored leaves 'neath the trees on the hillsides. We ate our lunches and had our physical exercises outside, too. When the snow came, we went sliding down those same hills. One night when I got home, after riding in a blizzard, there were icicles on my glasses! There are several squirrel families living close by. These little animals are unusually tame, often tripping up to the window sills and staying for hours at a time. We place pieces of crackers or cookies on a fence post and it is fun to watch one of the little fellows steal up cautiously at first, finally more bravely and seize it. How happy and carefree they are!

I am five feet, three inches tall; weigh 117 pounds, have dark brown hair, brown eyes, and am twenty-two years old.

Now, Uncle Lisha, if you will print this missive of mine, I will send you a huge piece of chocolate cake with thick white frosting, and a bowl heaping full of my delicious mousse—any flavor you may prefer. I hope this is an inducement!

Sincerely, your niece, BROWNIE.

I don't know, Brownie, why there should be less letters from Maine than from—well, say Missouri, for instance; unless it is that the cousins like to send their Family messages on long trips rather than to make pleasant neighborly calls. Yet the news you send makes me think the reason may be Mainely because the Pine Tree State's population is dwindling so. For what has become of all the boys and girls in Somerset County when seven pupils have to make up five grades in your school. This is a sad state of affairs and needs a remedy. Brownie, I think as good a teacher as you must be deserves a larger school and I am going to make you an offer. There are no less, according to Billy's count, than seven thousand, four hundred and thirty-nine boys and girls living within two blocks of where Bill eats his bran muffins and I write these words. Now if you will send parcel postage, Brownie, and tell me just how many you want, why I'll have these mailed up to fill your empty desks. Please give sizes, or otherwise I will send assorted specimens, carefully packed. Any nationalities you wish can be furnished, even Siamese, Roumanian and Czecho-Slovakian. I have all kinds of stock in all sizes. These boys and girls are of good quality and would just love to get away from sidewalks and subways and be up rambling around the woods and feeding the Somerset County squirrels with Uneeda biscuit and molasses cookies. So send on your order, Brownie, and I will have Billy get some pasteboard boxes and cord and help in the packing. That school of yours shall not remain empty while Brooklyn holds the proud title of the City of Baby Carriages.

I want to tell you, Brownie, how much I liked to hear that you were taking your lucky seven out with you and letting them play and learn at the same time in Mother Nature's old, old classroom. That old fellow who said there were "sermons in stones and books in the running brooks" knew what he was talking about and where the best lessons could be learned. If I were a boy again, Brownie, I should much prefer to go to school in Madison, Maine, than in Brooklyn, N. Y.

About that mouse you are going to send me, I say, thanks, very much, Brownie. Any little wood or field mouse will do and I think chestnut or acorn flavor would be nice. I like the little spotted variety best. Don't bother to send a whole bowl full; three or four will be enough. Meat is not so high here now. I would not send the chocolate cake in the same package, Brownie, as every mouse I ever knew had a good appetite and there might be nothing but a crumb or two of white frosting left for Bill and me. Thanks again, Brownie, and when the animals and the cake arrive, I'll reciprocate at once by sending just as many boys and girls for your school as you tell me you want—only be sure and enclose postage and give size, shape and color when you order.

LIVINGSTON, TENNESSEE.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I am a little boy nine years old. I love to read the cousins' letters and your answers. I like to read the trapping stories and about Cubby Bear. I have read several stories about Washington, Lincoln, Franklin and other great men.

I think I have the boy beat who wrote about his dog having treed a copperhead. I have a bulldog pup I can send to the field after the cows and hogs and he will bring them out. He bit the cow's tail off once. His name is Wheeler.

Will some of the cousins send me postcards? But I can't promise to answer all.

Mamma has taken COMFORT a long time. If my letter is printed I will be very glad and will write again.

Your loving nephew, CECIL HOLT.

That's one advantage in having great men, Cecil; and one way in which their spirit and deeds can live in the lives of others: we can read stories about them and get little brain-boosts and backbone stiffeners for ourselves from memories of what these men did and thought. Mind that when you get to be a great man, Cecil, that you do and say and write the things that other boys will be glad to hear about some day and be made better by hearing. There are all kinds of "great men," Cecil, dear boy, and sometimes the world and history uses the words without much discrimination. (This last is a big word which I should not have written, but it is too late now!) Yet it is the safest bet that among these great ones of the centuries, those are the greatest that a child would love best to know about, and whom you, Cecil, would love best if you could sit on their knees today. For, shucks! what is the use of any "great man" that children and dogs would not love at first sight? Now the least in the world, I'm sure—as Wheeler will agree also.

And speaking of dogs, Cecil; I thought you were going to tell us in your letter that Wheeler had treed a cow or hog, and so was the beatingest dog in Tennessee and superior to any little pup who had only made a copperhead run up a limb. And now it turns out that your bulldog only bit a cow's tail off! Why, I don't think that is much of a trick; a corncutter could do quite as much and make a much cleaner job of it. And I'll bet your dad didn't think it was any easy trick at all. Cecil, you must make your pet pup nip the cows' heels and let them have their tails left on to fight Tennessee flies with. You tell Wheeler I said this and that he must mind!

MERCED, CALIFORNIA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

A new cousin wishes to shake hands with Uncle and his family of cousins. There, that is accomplished, leaving my arm rather exhausted from the hearty greetings. I hope everyone is well and happy.

I live in a small town near the foothills of the wonderful Sierra Nevada Mountains. Ninety miles distant, in the heart of those mountains, is the Yosemite Valley, "The Land of Snows," where people from many countries journey to see and marvel in the beauties which Mother Nature has bestowed upon this famous resort. Here we find ancient redwoods, magnificent waterfalls, lakes, bubbling brooks scrambling over moss covered rocks, the invigorating, pine-scented atmosphere and mysterious forest covered ravines. I am a devoted lover of the outdoors, and my biggest desire is to live on a farm in the wilds, which, I admit, is a "wild" wish. Did I hear a cousin say she needed any hired help?

Were you ever rolled by a "breaker"? I was rolled twice in one day at Santa Cruz, a seaside resort where many of Merced's good people spend their summers. It is a terrible sensation to feel oneself turned upside down and flung about until one's head is all dizzy. And I lost a perfectly new bathing cap, too.

I enjoy the cousins' descriptions of themselves, so as there may be others who also do, I will briefly tell you how plain I am. My eyes are dark blue, hair brown, complexion fair; I am 5 ft. 3 in. short, weigh 125 lbs., and the most important of all is, I became a voter the day before April fool's day.

I like happy people and my motto is to scatter as much sunshine as I possibly can.

Our county has two daily newspapers, and I work for one of them. If any of the cousins have some poetry they wish to publish, send it along. Or, Uncle, you might write an editorial about "Disarmament" or the "High Cost of Living."

I would like very much to hear from cousins who live on large ranches or in the mountains.

Well, folks, I fear this is too long, so will close, trusting that Billy is taking his siesta when this is opened.

Sincerely your niece, SHIRLEY MAE SMITH.

If you like the pleasant job of scattering sunshine, Shirley, you live in a good part of the country to pursue your happy task. Certainly it is generally accepted as a fact that California has plenty of the bright commodity to spare. However, it will take quite a lot to go all around our Big Family—not that many of our number need it, I'm sure, but still we are all of to prettier teeth—you are welcome to it

A new-day method is bringing millions whiter, cleaner, safer teeth.

It is used by your friends, your neighbors. It is advised by dentists, urged by modern authorities. Glistening teeth seen everywhere now show the benefits it brings.

This is to offer a ten-day test to reveal its results to you.

It combats the film

The purpose is to remove the film which keeps teeth dim and dingy. Not for beauty only, but for safety. Most tooth troubles are now traced to film.

Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. The ordinary tooth paste does not effectively combat it. It is also the basis of tartar.

Film absorbs stains, making the teeth look cloudy or discolored. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acids. It holds the acids in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Germs breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

New methods found

Dental science has now found two ways to fight that film. Able authorities have proved their efficiency. Now careful people employ them nearly all the world over, largely by dental advice.

A new-type tooth paste has been created, to comply with modern requirements. The name is Pepsodent. Those two film combatants are embodied in it for daily application.

Two other essentials

Two other effects are essential, as proved by modern research.

The saliva contains two great tooth-protecting agents. One is a starch digestant, one is alkalis. One is to digest the starch deposits which cling to teeth and gum them. Often they ferment and form acids. The alkalis are to neutralize mouth acids —the cause of tooth decay.

Pepsodent stimulates those factors. It multiplies the starch digestant, multiplies the alkalis.

Watch the film go

Note how clean the teeth feel after using Pepsodent. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

These are facts you should know at once. Write us today for the 10-Day Tube. Cut out the coupon now.

Saving Our Skins

EVIDENTLY the generations back of us attached real importance to complexions, for there has come down to us an expression which we hear used constantly—"saving her skin." If a man has passed through some trying financial difficulties and comes out on the right side, his neighbors say: "Well, he saved his skin this time." If a woman is in a tight social place, but manages to get out of the predicament without loss of prestige, we all say: "Well, she saved her skin, after all."

But that is not the kind of saving I am going to talk about to my girls this month; I just wanted you to notice that enough importance was attached to skins in days gone by for a very picturesque expression to become a part of our ordinary conversation. And, pointing to a moral, I wanted you to attach as much importance to your skin as our ancestresses did to theirs.

A SWEATER CAPE IS EASY TO SLIP ON FOR PROTECTION.

This is the season of the year when it is easy to do real damage to a skin, for the sun above us is pouring down his blistering rays, strong enough to burn a skin to its serious damage; and if one is near the water, the beach sands are hot and reflect the glare of the sun, and the water left on the skin blisters in the heat and light. So there you are! And it certainly behooves us to take a few precautions.

And let me say that precautions are much better for your skin than all the cures and treatments in the world. One can mend a broken arm, but it is better not to break it; and one can soothe and heal a burned skin, but it is better not to blister it.

If you go in bathing or swimming, do not sit in the hot sand after, exposed to the sun. Have a big parasol to spread over you; a sweater cape to throw around you as you come out of the water—even a bathrobe will do, anything that will cover your wet skin from the sun. Then under the parasol or big umbrella, pat your skin dry. If you are wise you will carry a bag for little accessories when you go bathing, and one of them will be a bottle of a soothing hand or face lotion, which you can rub into the skin and which will be absorbed at once by the heat.

But bathing is not the only way in which one exposes the skin—picnicking, berrying, playing tennis, working in the garden; all these are skin-destroying tasks or pastimes, unless the face is protected from the sun's rays. So get a big hat—the bigger the better—one of the big farmer's hats is fine for berrying, gardening, etc. Line it with some pretty color, put a big soft fold of the material around the crown, and strings if you choose or use a hatpin, whichever you prefer; then never sit outdoors without it.

For "dress-up" occasions, where you do not want to wear anything of this kind, carry a parasol. They are really very attractive accessories, forming a lovely background for a face, besides affording the protection needed.

And then, of course, don't forget the cold-cream jar—your best friend in summer. Rub plenty cold cream into the skin before going outdoors, letting the skin absorb it, then dust on powder, and gently pat it with cotton. Neck as well as face needs this treatment, while the hands should have a good hand lotion rubbed in, after washing, always.

Answers to Questions

ANNE.—I judge you need a good internal cleansing. Impurities of the body need to be carried off so that they will not try to come out through the pores. The first thing you should do is to drink lots of water every day; then you must be very careful of your food, not eating foods which are hard to digest, but rather those which help elimination—which means, of course, the throwing out of the body of any impurities. Eat prunes every day—soak them over night, after washing, then cook them in the water in which they have been soaked, over a slow flame for an hour or more, until they are very soft. Eat a good big dish of these every morning for breakfast. Don't drink coffee, tea or eat fried foods. Pork and veal are hard to digest, so avoid them. Bacon is all right, because it is easily digested. If you are inclined to constipation, cut out potatoes and white bread for awhile, and eat instead green vegetables and fruits, and lean well-cooked meat—roasted or broiled. Having done these things, you have taken the first step toward giving your body proper materials for cleansing it internally; don't forget the water, eight or ten glasses a day, between meals. Never drink when you have food in your mouth, because that prevents you from giving it the proper chewing, and while the water softens it all right, it needs softening by the saliva in your mouth which contains elements which aid digestion. I think it might be a good idea for you to take a good dose of castor oil, or a thorough enema before starting on this carefully arranged diet, so that you may start out right. Then, of course, you need a good body bath every day; be careful not to rub the sore pimples on your face, but bathe them gently with hot soapy water and a soft cloth, and rinse them with the aid of another soft cloth dipped in clear warm water. Apply a little cold cream to your dry warm skin and gently rub it in, being careful not to break or irritate the pimples. Washing just your face will not be enough; your whole body should have a thorough washing in hot soapy water and a thorough rinsing in clear water every day. Use a little cool water last of all. If you will do as I suggest, and eat only the foods which are good for you, with prunes every day, spinach as often as you can get it—or other "greens," such as lamb's quarters, dandelions, etc.—berries, melons, etc., your face, I am sure, will begin to clear up very soon.

EMMA JANE.—First, I must say what I have said many times before; that the health of the hair depends upon the health of the body, and that hair to grow must be given nourishment through a well-nourished body. So look to diet, exercise, and all the things which build you up as a whole. Then for special treatment for the hair which will not grow thick, massage the scalp every night and morning. This promotes the circulation, feeds the scalp, and makes the hair healthy, provided the body has the elements of health to pass on to it. To massage the scalp, let the hair down, slip the fingers of your left hand flattened under the hair on the left side of the head, pressed firmly against the scalp, while your right hand is used in the same way at the right side of the scalp. Now without raising the fingers, move the scalp back and forth on the skull. If the scalp is tight and does not want to move, that indicates at once that here the trouble lies, for the blood cannot circulate properly nor the hair receive proper nourishment with a tight scalp. Move the fingers to another spot on the scalp, after a thorough massage of the first spot, and continue until the whole scalp has been gone over in this fashion and is glowing with healthy warmth. Remember not to let the fingers rub back and forth but to press them firmly and move the scalp, not the fingers. Of course the fingers go along with the scalp but they do not rub back and forth against the hair itself. Don't sleep with the hair done up. Let it down at night, brush it very gently indeed, air it thoroughly, then sleep with it either hanging loose or very loosely braided. In the meantime, eat properly and enough, drink lots of water, look after the body as a whole. About the almond bleach, it is not injurious to any skin—quite the contrary. No skin stays "bleached" if it is exposed to the sun or to any other condition which can affect it. The way to keep your skin white and fair, is to protect it. About rolling the eyes, I should drop that exercise if I were you. It won't make your eyes bright. Good health is the only thing that will do that satisfactorily, so make up your mind to eat sensible nourishing things, to exercise, bathe daily, get plenty of fresh air, enough sleep, drink lots of water and see that the eliminative processes of the body are kept as they should be. Feet cannot be reduced in size, but they can be made firm of flesh by exercise. So practice feet exercises and leg exercises. People do not lay so much stress on small feet as they used to; indeed it is quite fashionable to have good-sized feet. You see, girls of this day are more athletic than our grandmothers were, and naturally have and need larger feet. A six shoe is quite an ordinary thing now, where women used to crowd their feet into fours and fives. Here is a good foot exercise:

Exercise for the Feet

Standing with heels together and toes slightly apart, hands on hip, chin up, back straight, rise slowly on the tips of your toes without bending back or knees. Maintain position on tips of toes for a moment, then slowly let heels sink to floor again. Repeat ten or fifteen times.

Another Exercise for Feet

Taking same position, rise on tiptoes, then keeping back perfectly straight, bend the knees, and sink to a squatting position without letting the heels of the feet touch the floor. Rise again, sink again, and repeat for fifteen times.

OKLAHOMA.—Bowlegs have been straightened by an operation. In fact, very recently quite a noted actress had her legs straightened in this way. This means surgeons, hospitals, nurses,—and, alas! bills! And most of us cannot afford it. I do not know whether you can improve the bowed condition by exercise; it would depend, largely, on how bowed the legs were. Will it comfort you at all to know that of the legs one sees on the city boulevards these days—and one has a good chance to examine them—a large number are far from straight? One of the prettiest girls I know has legs that are very decidedly bowed. She wears her dresses just a tiny bit longer than the other girls, but she goes in bathing in an ordinary bathing suit, and I can't see that anybody pays any attention to it. She thinks about it a good deal herself, but nobody else gives it a moment's thought. Here is an exercise you might practice:

Special Leg Exercise

Standing with legs about eight or ten inches apart, back straight, hands on hips, bend each foot on its side, inward. Back to flat-footed position; then on side again. Practice rapidly and bend the feet as far forward as possible, each time. You might practice the tiptoe exercise given "Emma Jane," but with the feet about eight inches apart, and as you rise to the tiptoes bend the legs inward.

BUTTERFLY.—You should not wash your hair every week unless it is exceptionally oily. Once in two weeks is often enough, and with hair which is not oily once in three weeks will often be all that is necessary. Too frequent washing removes the natural oil from the hair, on which it depends for health and growth. You say you wash your face in hot soapy water at night and rinse in cold water; and have blackheads. You would have, if you use only cold water for rinsing, because cold water cannot wash away soap and your pores would be clogged with the soap you had used. Do not rub soap on the skin, but only use it in the water. Then rinse in very warm water many times, then in tepid water, and finally in cool water. Use tepid water on the face in the morning. Pressing out the blackheads, as a constant habit, rather tends to keep the pores enlarged. If you press out the contents of a pore, always touch it at once with alcohol or peroxide. I am sorry it is against the rules of this department to express an opinion on proprietary remedies; for what is good for one skin may be injurious to another; and also it is impossible to know the ingredients of all such remedies. A good face bleach is the almond meal face bleach recommended by me in February COMFORT. But no bleach should be used constantly. If the face is tanned, use a simple harmless bleach, such as the almond meal preparation, once; then take care of the skin.

M. E. K.—The way to reduce your stomach is, first of all, not to take much food at a time. Stomachs become enlarged and "fallen" from ill-treatment, and I suggest that you be careful to eat moderate meals, and not to drink with your meals. Do not take more than half a glass of liquid at one drink, and let that be between meals. Drink plenty of liquid, but in these small amounts. When you lie down, lie on your right side. You are over weight, showing that you need to reduce. Cut out potatoes, rice, white bread, macaroni, gravies, fat meat, for the time being. Eat fruits, green vegetables and lean meat, chewing every mouthful until it is liquid, and being careful to eat very moderately and especially not to drink with your meals. You ought to lose about forty pounds, at least thirty. Cut out sweets altogether, no pies or cakes. Eat for breakfast, two soft-boiled eggs—three and one-half or four minutes, no longer, and taken out of the shell as soon as the time is up; a dish of berries or melon without sugar, or a dish of prunes cooked without sugar. The eggs will give you the nourishment needed. For dinner eat a piece of broiled steak, of roast beef or lamb or mutton, chicken (roasted or broiled, but not fried), fish but no pork or veal; no potato, but spinach or asparagus, or string beans or carrots, squash, etc. For dessert, fresh fruit again. For supper, a dish of tomatoes, some cold meat, a baked apple. A stomach will be large if it is over-filled with either solid fruit or liquid, and if it has become enlarged by constant over-filling, then one has to be very careful indeed as to the amount put in it at any one time. You speak of shortness of breath; if this is only from an over-full stomach, you will get over that in time. Exercise will help to reduce your waist and abdomen, but the important thing is to eat less at a time. Shortness of breath often comes from heart trouble, and in that case of course exercise is injurious. Better be sure about this; though you sound as if all the trouble came from having formed the habit of a too-full stomach and probably from drinking a good deal at meals. Your weight would make this seem to be the case. A good exercise for reducing abdomen and waist, not to be practiced, of course, if there is any heart trouble, is as follows:

To Reduce Waist and Abdomen

Lying on back, raise right leg at right angles with the body, without bending the knee. Let leg return to level, but very slowly indeed. Repeat with left leg, then with both, fifteen times each.

arguments on what to teach the child at home and could talk forever on the subject but will stop.

I was raised with a family of boys, therefore know well many boys so can say this to girls: no decent boy likes the girl who makes herself conspicuous by being either extreme, prudish or vampish. Follow a sensible medium if you would be respected—you are no better than the crowd you are with.

This letter is already long and I haven't said a word about many things of which I wanted to talk.

I am just a little wife, twenty-two years old. Was brought up on a farm, can milk cows, drive horses, was a teacher, make my own clothes and sew for others, do all kinds of housework, drive a car and help my husband make cheese. I have always tried to learn to do one new thing each year and for this coming year I have set my goal on a cheesemaker's license.

I enjoy the Sisters' Corner very much and receive much help through its columns. HAPPY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

In answer to Kentucky Lassie's question of whether there is such a thing as love at first sight, I will say that there is. My husband and I loved at first sight and were married in three weeks from the time we first met and there isn't a happier family anywhere than we are, with our three children, eight, four and two years of age. Of course all cases may not turn out as happily as ours has. MRS. O. A. C.

INDIANA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a silent reader of this cheery Corner for a good many years but have hesitated about writing for I felt that other letters were of more importance than mine but I read Black-Eyed Susan's letter this morning and I can keep still no longer. In regard to remarriage I say never, for I am writing from my own experience.

My first husband was the best man ever. We never had a cross word in all our married life. I never asked for anything but what I got it and whenever I wanted to go any place I went. He was taken, leaving me with two baby boys. I found it a hard task to earn their living and my own so after a period of five years I married again, a nice, respectable man of reasonable means. Our life was perfectly happy for two years at which time a baby girl came to our home and then trouble began. My husband won't have one of my boys in the home at all and the other boy never sees any pleasure, or I either, since the baby came. Baby plays all over the house, makes all the noise she wants to but there is trouble if my boy doesn't sit down and act like an old man when he is in the house. Nothing is ever wanted for baby but what she gets it but my boy never gets anything without there being a fuss made first, not even a pencil or tablet and he has never had a suit of clothes in his life. The boy is anxious to learn to work but he never does anything right and generally receives a kick or a whipping. Husband is a great church member, is very liberal with money to pay the preacher but forgets his religion as soon as he gets home. I scarcely ever go to church for I haven't clothes fit to wear as I haven't had a Sunday dress since I was last married. I never go anywhere only to see my other boy and that's only about twice a year and husband has to go along. The car fare is about two dollars and he will be cross for a week afterwards and will fret about the money he had to pay out for us. I do everything I can to please him but he is never satisfied. I know some of you are wondering why I stay with him but I can't leave my baby and I can't earn a living for so many. It isn't often that a second marriage is a success so I say to Black-Eyed Susan that as long as she can make a living she had better stay single. I only wish I could make my choice again. TROUBLED.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

This is my first attempt to get into the corner and I will tell Mrs. Long how I cured my children (Henry, five, and Annie Laura, three), from fighting. When they begin fussing and fighting I just take a rag or piece of cloth and wrap it around their hands and pin the cloth to their sleeves to keep it from coming off. It has worked wonderfully. Another thing to stop a quarrel or fuss is to put a small piece of adhesive plaster over their mouths. I hope this will help yours as it has mine.

Stella Rosevelt

"But if she is really the author of the book—it has been very popular, you know——"

"Nonsense!" interrupted her mother. "I tell you such a thing could not be possible."

Nevertheless, Mrs. Richards was closely watching the object of their conversation, and her heart was beating with a painful throb, for the young girl did strangely resemble that poor orphan whom she had so despised and ill-treated, and who had fled from her tyranny.

But her uneasiness increased, for just now she observed a tall, white-haired gentleman moving toward the girl, and upon reaching her side, he bent down and spoke a few words in her ear.

His back also was toward them, but the matron's face was dark with trouble; she grew white with the sudden fear which possessed her, and she moved forward to get a better view of the couple.

At that instant Star turned and lifted her bright face to reply to Mr. Rosevelt, who had left his position by the stand of flowers when she ceased dancing and approached her, her eyes shining, her cheeks glowing, and her coral lips wreathed with bright smiles, and both Josephine and Mrs. Richards recognized her instantly.

A low cry of surprise and dismay broke from Josephine Richards' lips.

"It is—it surely is Stella Gladstone," she said; "and that man talking to her is certainly Uncle Jacob Rosevelt! What can it all mean?"

"Rosevelt! Yes, that is the name," said Mr. Pendleton, who had caught it, and who had first called their attention to Star. "'Jacob Rosevelt, the millionaire,' I heard him called this afternoon, but I forget names so easily."

"Jacob Rosevelt, the millionaire!" repeated Mrs. Richards, with white lips and astonished eyes, while a tumult of emotions raged within her heart.

"Yes; he must be very rich, for they have every appearance of it, and Miss Gladstone's turnout, which was sent on before them, is a marvel of luxury and elegance. But—do you know them?" Mr. Pendleton asked, regarding her curiously.

Mrs. Richards' thoughts worked very rapidly.

If this was really Jacob Rosevelt, and she could not doubt the evidence of her own eyes, he must by some stroke of luck have recovered a portion, if not the whole, of his fortune since leaving her house; and in this case he became at once an entirely different person from the feeble, poverty-stricken individual who had come to her a little more than a year ago to sue for food and shelter.

Therefore, she had a new role to play, and she would begin at once by claiming him as a relative before these friends of hers.

"It would be very strange if I did not know him, for he is my father's brother," she said, calling to her lips her blandest smiles; "but I am sure I had no idea that he was here in Newport. Come, Josephine, we must go and speak to him;" and she drew the astonished girl away before they could question them any further, and she wished to collect her own scattered senses a little before encountering those two whom she had so deeply injured.

"What can it mean, mamma?" Josephine repeated, with a blank look, for she had no longer any doubt about the identity of the strangers.

"I don't know, but I am going to find out," she answered, resolutely.

"Then you are convinced that it is Stella?"

"Yes, it is that girl fast enough; there can be no mistake about it; and what a sensation she is making! She seems to checkmate us at every move."

"Where can they have been hiding all this time?" Josephine asked.

"How do you suppose I know?" retorted her mother, sharply. "I am more interested to know where all the money comes from to enable them to cut such a swell. Why, the dress she has on must have cost a cool three hundred, to say nothing about her other expensive fixings; and then you heard what Pendleton said about her carriage and ponies."

"Well, he said she was the author of 'Chatsworth's Pride,' and if that is so, it must have brought her a good deal."

"Pooh! you don't suppose one book is going to enable her to live and dress like a young empress, do you?" returned Mrs. Richards, scornfully. "No; Uncle Jacob has recovered his fortune, or else——"

"Or else what?"

"He has played it upon us."

"Played what upon us?"

"Why, poverty, you goose!"

"Mamma! that would be too dreadful. I never thought of such a thing," Josephine said, feeling almost faint.

"Nor I, until this moment; but I can account for their appearance here tonight in no other way. If he has done this thing, and that girl gets all his money, it will be a bitter pill to swallow, I can tell you."

"But she could inherit nothing; she is no blood relation."

"But he could make a will."

"And we could break it."

"Not a bit of it; your Uncle Jacob is keen enough to look out for that, I assure you. But come this way; they are passing out into the hall, and I am going to sift this matter at once."

She drew her daughter from the upper door of the parlor, just as Star and Mr. Rosevelt passed out at the lower one, intending to waylay them and demand an explanation of their presence.

CHAPTER XXVII.

DEFEATED.

When they were within a few feet of the upper door, Mrs. Richards stepped toward them and stood directly in their path.

The hall was nearly empty, almost everybody being in the parlors or the dancing-hall, so there was no one by just at that moment to witness what transpired.

"What does this mean?" Mrs. Richards demanded, in a low but authoritative tone. "Stella Gladstone, how is it that I find you here? Uncle Jacob, where have you been all this time, and what strange freak of fortune brings you here in this unaccountable fashion?"

Mr. Rosevelt started slightly on beholding his niece standing in that excited attitude directly in his path; while Star grew pale at first, for she had always stood somewhat in fear of the arrogant woman while she was an inmate of her house. But remembering that everything was entirely different now, she quickly recovered herself.

"Tell me what this means?" Mrs. Richards repeated, looking from one to the other, noting Star's delicate beauty with a pang of bitter jealousy, her self-possession and grace; Mr. Rosevelt's improved appearance, his rich apparel, and, more than all, the air of pride and fondness which pervaded every look and attention which he bestowed upon his companion.

"Well, Niece Ellen," Mr. Rosevelt returned, in a quiet tone, while he met her eye with a cold, steady glance that made her very uncomfortable, "it appears that you are considerably excited over this unexpected meeting. Suppose we retire to yonder anteroom, where we can converse unobserved."

He turned and led the way, with Star upon his arm, to a small room upon the opposite side of the hall; they entered, and he shut the door, for he did not care that any one should overhear what passed between them, nor did he intend that Ellen Richards should do or say anything which should make them objects of remark.

"Now, Ellen, what is it that I am to account to you for?" he asked, in the same quiet tone which he had before used.

She colored angrily, but she was determined to get at the bottom of the matter.

"I have heard strange rumors tonight," she remarked. "I am told that Stella has become an authoress—that she is very popular, as well as her book, and I want to know what it means. A year ago you were both dependents upon my bounty; now I find you sailing about, like a couple of meteors, among the other shining lights of society. I want an explanation of the cause of this change."

"Certainly, Ellen; since you desire it, I will explain with pleasure. We left your house last October, as you doubtless well remember, and took up our abode in New York City. Star entered the Normal College at once, and by assiduous application to her studies, succeeded in completing the course, and graduated in June, since when we have been trying to get all the enjoyment out of life that we could. You have heard rightly, Ellen; she did write that popular little book, 'Chatsworth's Pride,' and it is a source of pride to me that I have the honor of introducing in society its popular author as my ward and heiress——"

"Your heiress!" Mrs. Richards cried, growing pale.

"Yes; Miss Gladstone is named as such in my will, which is now in the hands of my lawyer," the old gentleman replied, quietly.

His niece looked from one to the other in blank dismay. She had feared she should hear something of the kind, but it was none the less a shock to her when it came.

"Your heiress—heiress to what?" she demanded, sharply.

"To the whole of my fortune, madam."

"Your fortune!" she sneered, but her voice was hoarse from passion and baffled hopes. "A year ago it was—beggary!"

Mr. Rosevelt smiled serenly.

"Apparently, yes," he answered. "But I was then, what I am now—a millionaire. The mistake of your lifetime was made then, Ellen; for if you had cordially received the feeble old man who came to your house in such a forlorn condition; if you had given him kindness and sympathy, such as you were wont to do when he was rich and prosperous; if you had shown him something of love and tenderness, instead of coldness and contempt, making him feel that he was a burden and an intruder, you would have had the bulk of my fortune, for your brother had already forfeited his share. I thought that my final return to this country would give me a good opportunity to test your and Henry's sincerity, and I resolved to do so. I went to him as a poor man; I was received coldly, and made as uncomfortable as it was possible for any one to be made. Then I said to myself, 'Ellen's womanly heart will prompt her to be kind to me, if not for my own sake, for her father's,' and so I came to you also in the guise of poverty."

"It was mean—it was dishonorable to take advantage of me in that way," Mrs. Richards said, with white, quivering lips.

"Not at all. I wanted to know you as you were, not what you pretended to be. I do not need to tell you the result of my plan; we all know it but too well. No one gave me a word of sympathy or kindness save this dear girl"—he laid his hand tenderly on Star's shoulder—"who did her utmost to make the old man forget as far as was possible his bitter disappointment, and who had already earned his love and gratitude by saving his life, almost at the sacrifice of her own, during that terrible voyage across the Atlantic. She has been like a sunbeam to me from the first; and when I saw how unkind you all were to her, also—how you were betraying your trust and breaking your promise to her dying father—I resolved that she should become my especial care for the future.

"I do not need to recall to your memory the last night that we spent in your house in Yonkers. It must be as fresh to you as it is to me. You taunted us both with our poverty and dependence. You drove her to desperation by your unjust accusations and your heartless language. She could not endure that kind of a life any longer, and she knew that I also was anything but happy; so she came to me, told me the secret of her success as an author, and of the income which her book bade fair to bring her, and begged of me to go with her to share her substance, asking in return only the comfort of congenial companionship and the protection which my presence would give her. I was sorely tempted, as I have told her, to confess the part I had been playing, and proclaim her my heiress on the spot. But I thought, considering all things, it would be better to wait until she was through with school, while I wanted to study her a little more closely before committing my all to her. She has stood the test most nobly. She has been the light of our home. She has labored early and late to minister to my comfort and happiness, and now she is going to reap her reward. Everything that I can do for her to make her life bright, I shall do while I live, and when I am gone, she will have the fortune which, under different circumstances, would have been mostly yours."

Mrs. Richards was pallid with anger, mortification and bitter disappointment when Mr. Rosevelt concluded.

"Well, miss, you have played your cards very cleverly, haven't you?" she finally found breath to ejaculate, and turning with blazing eyes upon the fair girl who, all unwittingly, had usurped her place in her uncle's affection and will.

Mr. Rosevelt's face grew stern.

"She certainly has, Ellen," he said, before Star could speak, even had she wished to do so, "especially as she could not, by any means, have known that there was anything worth winning by her acts of devotion and self-denial. And now let me tell you, that true kindness and sympathy will always win, where arrogance and pride will only gain contempt, and lead to disappointment and regret."

First Aid to the Neighbors

By Frances L. Garside

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

WHEN in the final reckoning of success measure is taken of results finer than material gains, it will surprise many to see the quiet little neighborhood activity step ahead of the large factory in the city.

"I give employment," the factory might say with vehement belching of smoke, "to two thousand able-bodied men."

The quiet little neighborhood activity might turn away without a word. Employment to some twenty or thirty or forty women seems so insignificant.

But—— in the final reckoning this little first aid to women who need small sums with which to supply the small needs of those who do not ask much, is the greater thing. The able-bodied men are able to march to other fields for employment should the factory close; the little neighborhood activity furnishes employment to women who are too old to take positions in industrial life—too encumbered with cares of family and household to walk beyond the front gate to earn money, and who are not trained in the ways of the world.

Almost without exception these opportunities to earn money and remain at home while doing it, picking up the task in the lull between dinner and supper, are furnished through the energy of some other woman. She discovers, originates, invents. Being by heredity a home body, she begins to make the thing she has discovered, originated or invented, right in her home. Because she is a home body, loving and depending on her neighbors for many things, she turns to them for assistance in her venture.

There is Mrs. Carolyn A. Tefft, of Belvidere, Ill. She was a milliner, and being unable to find the exact flowers she wanted one day, she made them. They still lacked the quality she sought, and she supplied it with paint and brush. It was a bunch of sweet peas. It should have been a laurel wreath for that is what Mrs. Tefft's neighbors think she should be wearing now. A friend saw the flowers and asked her to make her a spray; she began to make all the flowers that trimmed her bonnet. Then, naturally, because the flowers were so unusual and so artistic, she ceased the making of the bonnets.

That bunch of sweet peas is now trailing in sweet profusion from Maine to California. In the beginning it furnished work for one assistant. More orders came until, today, less than seven years since the first sweet peas blossomed under her hands, she gives employment to fifty women who gather in her home to do the work, and scores more who do it in their homes.

One variety of flowers in the beginning; now 350 varieties. Solely for hats when she made the first flowers, she now makes them for every sort of decoration from party gowns to lamp shades. Some idea of the extent to which the business has grown (which means how many of the neighbor women are employed) may be gathered from this item: Mrs. Tefft uses over ten thousand yards of ribbon a month, and recently her products have been shipped to New Zealand, Australia and Shanghai to fill orders from those distant lands.

Women come to her for all day; for half day, or do piece work at home. "I think," said Mrs. Tefft," the thing which makes me happiest in the work is that I am able to give employment to so many who are crippled or invalid shut-ins—and such beautiful things to work with! They tell me the beautiful colors and fabrics make them forget their pain. It would not be so helpful to them if their hands were employed on ticking or ugly cardboards. I have been urged to turn my business over to a factory in a large city. There are two reasons why I refuse. The first is that employment would be taken out of the hands of so many of my neighbors, and the second is that the flowers would look machine-made."

There live in Ligonier, Ind., two sisters, Ona and Rosalie Wilkinson. They make quilts, and some half hundred women gather in their workroom every day, and laugh and chatter and sing as they bend over their quilting frames. All are from the neighborhood. To many, as in the industry of making flowers, there would be no way of earning money if this little neighborhood activity ended.

There are scores of women doing these things. "Ours is such a little industry," they say deprecatingly. "I think the owners of the large businesses would laugh at our output, for it is small compared with what the factories turn out."

But—in the final reckoning it may be found that the smaller business was the greater success. Those who furnish employment to women, employment which brings money they could not otherwise earn because of the encumbering duties of family and home; those who do this are achieving something greater than they know.

And usually, bless them, it is women. A man invents, discovers or originates, and the large city beckons, and he moves away. Sometimes he doesn't wait for it to beckon. But the woman, being more loving than ambitious, stays.

Summer Diseases of Babies

DURING the months of June, July and August we shall take, as subjects for our talks, the diseases that babies suffer with during the hot summer months, hoping that we may be able to offer some suggestions that will be helpful in their care and treatment, and prevent them from serious illness.

SIMPLE DIARRHEA.—Under this head we shall discuss a mild form of diarrhea to which babies are very subject, in which the condition appears to be one of mere functional disorder, and very little, if any, congestion of intestinal mucous membrane. The causes of simple diarrhea are unfavorable hygienic conditions, badly ventilated, damp dwellings, contracted or crowded quarters, unhealthy state of mother if nursing baby, use of artificial food at a too early age, especially if improper food, teething, and very hot weather. The most important of these causes is improper food, with exclusion of proper amount of milk. The habit of aflowing babies to eat food from the table prepared for older members of the family is a dangerous one, and a fruitful cause of stomach and intestinal complaints. There is not much doubt but what most babies have too many sweets, especially candy. Diarrhea may follow as a consequence of an attack of indigestion, and may occur in babies previously healthy, and continue for weeks. The symptoms of simple diarrhea are discomfort, disturbance of temper and comfort of baby, restlessness, peevishness and disposition to cry; the baby sleeps less than usual, often starts and moans during sleep, more marked during night, as is the case of any ailment of babies. The baby may seem perfectly well during the day, with the exception of slight paleness and weakness, appetite diminished, baby will not eat as often or as much as usual.

The stools are thinner and more copious and the odor becomes acrid and offensive. In severe cases the stools are more fluid, watery, and may be of a deep green color, intermixed with portions of mucous; also you may note undigested curds mixed with mucous on napkins. The number of stools may vary from two to ten during twenty-four hours. The abdomen is seldom distended or painful to touch, the general appearance of baby is paler and thinner, eyes somewhat hollow.

The duration of the disorder is short, a few days or a week, and terminates in complete recovery to health, without having exposed the life of the baby; but if the cause is not removed, if the baby has a delicate constitution, or the treatment not proper, this simple diarrhea may run into entero-colitis and the dangers of the latter disease.

The treatment of simple diarrhea, first, consists in attention to diet, exercise and the state of the gums. We mention state of gums, as often you may get disturbed digestion and diarrhea from a tooth or teeth trying to come through; gums are swollen and red. The relief is the lancing of swollen gums under antiseptic precautions. This often seems brutal in young babies, but it is not, as nature forces the tooth through the gums and you simply help out by cutting down on the tooth coming.

In severe cases, gums badly swollen, baby feverish, digestion upset, it is good judgment to make circular incision over tooth, uncovering it and allowing it to bleed freely, and the relief is most satisfactory to all concerned.

In regard to diet, if baby is nursing, we must take into careful consideration the health, diet and temper of mother, all of which circumstances more or less affect her milk. If we consider the mother's milk is good and is only disturbed in its healthy properties by some transient cause, it should be allowed to nurse, but not quite as much as usual.

If we decide the mother's milk is unhealthy, the baby should be weaned at once. Its diet should consist of milk or cream weakened with water, unless it has been clearly shown by previous experiences that these articles of diet do not agree with baby. If baby cannot take milk and this is proven by patient trial, it is best to try rice water with a little cream in it, or thin gruel.

If baby is six or eight months old it is well to let it have a chicken bone or a juicy piece of beefsteak to suck, or carefully prepared chicken or mutton water or broth. It is best to continue ordinary outdoor exercise unless cold or damp; in fact, in good weather, exposure to air is more important in simple diarrhea than in health. The only precaution is to not allow baby to weaken or tire itself, particularly in warm weather, as this seems to aggravate the complaint. Baby should be given a teaspoonful of castor oil to remove any intestinal contents, especially is this important if the stools are green.

Bismuth subnitrate, in doses of one to five grains according to age, is the most valuable astringent we have to check bowel movements, and should be given from three to six times a day, depending on frequency of movements.

For baby six months old, if discharges are frequent and painful, should give bismuth subnitrate, two grains every two or three hours, to which you may add two drops of paregoric. Subject for next month's talk: Summer Diseases of Babies,—Continued.

Questions and Answers

ENLARGED THYROID GLAND.—I have a daughter, thirty-four months old, who has an enlarged thyroid gland on the right side of neck that does not seem to be relieved by anything we can do for it. What is the cause, and what can I do for it?

MRS. G. W. N., Bagley, Minn.

A.—There are several kinds of enlarged thyroid glands, and the exact causes have not been definitely settled. Would suggest that you put your daughter on Syrup of Hydriodic Acid (Gardner's) in one-half teaspoonful doses, well diluted in water, three times a day, after meals. Locally, should apply Iodex spread on cloth like a poultice, covering the whole gland. This treatment if followed out faithfully for several weeks gives most gratifying results.

CRYING BABY.—What can I do for my three-months-old baby who cries, kicks and grunts all the time she is awake? Her hands and feet are cold most of the time, and I have to give her something for her bowels. She sleeps very well during daytime.

MRS. B. P., Itmann, W. Va.

A.—You do not state whether you are nursing the baby or not, but there is not much doubt that she cries from indigestion. If you are nursing her, get your own bowels and digestion in normal condition, avoid foods that seem to cause gas, take after each meal two teaspoonfuls of Elix Lactated Pepsin. Give baby milk of magnesia in teaspoonful doses often enough to keep her bowels regular. A baby does not cry all the time unless there is some cause for it, and as indigestion is the most common cause, correcting this will relieve crying.

HEMORRHOIDS.—Please tell me what to do for hemorrhoids that have troubled me badly since baby was born seven months ago. The bleeding is profuse, and the pain so severe at times that I can hardly endure it.

MRS. O. W. T., Spratt, Ala.

A.—Keep bowels freely open with tablespoonful doses of Nujol; after each bowel movement insert an Iodex suppository, which you can get at most drug stores. For a while, until relieved, you should sit in a sitz bath, hot as possible for twenty minutes. You can arrange this bath in large wash-bowl, the hot water relieving the congestion of pelvic organs.

CONSTIPATED BABY.—My three-months-old baby has lumpy stools, although of a good color. What causes this, and what causes baby to cramp when bowels move? (b) How does a baby act when liver is not right?

MRS. G. G., Louisburg, Ky.

A.—The bowels not being open enough would cause the lumpy movements, also cramps. (b) Vomiting, later on jaundice, are symptoms of liver troubles.

ENLARGED SPLEEN.—For a year I have had an enlarged spleen and attacks of malaria. My baby, eighteen months old, also has enlarged spleen and throat trouble. Please advise us what to do.

MRS. J. L. B., Cato, Ark.

A.—Would suggest that you and the baby go to some competent physician for an examination and treatment. While it would seem that you both needed quinine, it does not seem advisable to suggest treatment, with so little information.

URIC ACID POISONING.—Can you tell me how to avoid serious trouble from uric acid poisoning at confinement? My history is as follows: Have had female trouble ever since I was tweive years old; have had pain in back of head and neck most of the time. Eight years ago when my baby was born, I had a serious attack of uræmia and was unconscious thirty-six hours; had a slight attack two years ago.

MRS. J. B., Partridge, Kans.

A.—You should have the urine examined often, and be sure that the bowels and kidneys are performing their proper function. Should drink lots of water between meals, and have milk and buttermilk make important part of your diet. The danger signals that you will note are dizzy headaches, swelling of feet or any part of body.

WEANING BABY.—I am going to wean my thirteen-months-old baby and am writing for advice as to what to rub on breasts at that time. What shall I feed baby?

MRS. H. H., Oconto, Wisc.

A.—Bind the breasts snugly to chest with bandage or adhesive plaster, the object being to prevent the milk coming into breasts; drink very little liquids, using the breast-pump if breasts get painful. Baby's diet should be mostly milk, oatmeal gruels, stale wheat bread toasted, graham crackers, baked potato and soft-boiled occasionally.

FLANNEL BANDS.—Are the little knit bands, that tie on the side or those that lap through as good as flannel bands?

———, Pickford, Mich.

A.—I think flannel bands are preferable.

ECZEMA.—My seven-months-old baby has one tooth, also has eczema all over her body. The stools are greenish and jelly like, not relieved by castor oil. Does the teething or the eczema cause the green stools, and are they dangerous? Please suggest remedy for eczema.

MRS. L. M., Whitby, W. Va.

A.—The teething probably causes the green stools, but there must be a hyperacidity of all secretions. Give baby lime-water in food, three tablespoonfuls a day. Give teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia often enough to keep bowels regular. There are a great many kinds of eczema, but should sponge off parts affected with Dakins' solution, then apply a little sulphur ointment. If the sulphur ointment does not seem to agree, apply a little oxide of zinc ointment.

ANEMIA AND MALNUTRITION.—My five-year-old baby daughter does not seem well; no appetite, pale, thin, blotches come out on tongue occasionally, seems nervous, sleeps with eyes partly open, has vomiting spells quite often, and complains of her stomach hurting her. She swallowed a penny when about two years old. Would this cause the trouble?

MRS. F. M. M., Salt Lake City, Utah.

A.—Do not think the penny would cause any annoyance, but the X-ray examination would eliminate it from consideration. This seems to be a case of anemia and malnutrition, and would suggest an outdoor life as much as possible, careful, nutritious diet, milk, broths, soft-boiled eggs. Should give her Neoferrum, or Peptomangan (Gude's), in teaspoonful doses, three times a day, after meals.

RICKETS, RUPTURE.—My baby sweats on head and body if room is warm. Does this indicate rickets? (b) How can I tell if baby is ruptured?

MRS. J. C. R., Haigler, Nebr.

A.—No, this does not indicate rickets. (b) If baby is ruptured you will notice a protrusion or bunch at navel or on either side lower down, especially if baby coughs or cries.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

I am the mother of three healthy babies, five, three and one and one-half years old. Elmer is the baby, and I have my hands full, as I do all my sewing and housework and part of the washing, and I have time to crochet.

Mrs. Moxley, I'll tell you another way to break babies from sucking their fingers. Take a piece of cardboard, cut hole in center and put arm through it, fastening it at the elbow. Cardboard should be large enough so the arm cannot be bent to get the fingers to the mouth.

I would like to hear from some of the sisters.

OWEETER NIXON.

MILTON, OREGON.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

That's what most of you are. One sister gave me a most uncomfortable feeling a few months ago when she wrote that she refused to shake hands with the farmer's wife who helped her husband with the outside work. I had my hand extended for a good old-fashioned greeting and she passed me right up because I do a little work outdoors. I've never broken down my health by doing heavy work but I pile brush when my husband is clearing timber, and I have shocked an acre and a half of hay a few times, but my main job this spring is driving the tractor while my husband plows or levels. When I have to spend most of my days outside he is always ready and willing to help me with the meals. That way we save the expense of a hired man and I get exercise.

BETTY MAY RUHBERG.

I have two boys going to school and a little girl 'most three. I am sending her picture taken just before Christmas. Her birthday was May 16. Her name is Betty May and she has dark eyes and eyebrows and light hair, a rare combination.

Now a word concerning the topography and products of this section of the United States. I live in a narrow valley among the foothills of the Blue Mountains in northeastern Oregon. The south fork of the Walla Walla runs down our valley and abounds in trout and salmon in season. It is said that our river has as much drop in six miles as the Mississippi River has from St. Louis to the Gulf of Mexico. Regarding the products, we raise the biggest apples than can be grown. Most people in the Middle States and in the East and even in California, have no conception of what first-grade Oregon or Washington apples look like. We also raise fine large prunes, not to mention pears, peaches and every kind of berry. The foothills are covered with wheat and lots of the bottom land is in alfalfa.

When I visit folks I like to go and spend the day so this accounts for a lengthy letter.

Good by, MARY E. RUHBERG.

ALLEN, MISS.

DEAR MRS. W. AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for only a short time but in that short time I have learned enough to know that Pearl Vesey knew what she was saying when she stated that the COMFORT sisters had "golden hearts." Isn't it wonderful that so many people, scattered all over the United States, can have such a sisterly spirit?

I live on a farm and have two little girls and one baby boy. There was never one who liked farm life better than I, and it keeps me busy. I do all my work. In canning season I can everything possible from my garden, as well as making and caring for the garden, besides my sewing, housecleaning and washing.

Just now I am making a bedroom set, consisting of spread, bolster cover, table runner, scarf for the mantelpiece, chair back cover and window curtains. Also a dining-room set consisting of serving table cover, dining table cover and curtains for inside of closet door. These are made of flour sacks. This is how I do it. I pull threads in order to cut straight and hem all edges with tiny hem on fingers, in running stitches of No. 100 thread. Fagot these together with No. 10 crochet thread or fine thread doubled. Fagoting is like thornstitching (brier stitching) but instead of working on top of goods, catch the edge of each hem. This makes a dainty insertion. After putting together enough sacks to form the article wanted I fagot on a colored border on which applique two red cherries, made of red gingham, two small green leaves and stems made of green thread. In the center of each dining-room piece I appliqued three red apples, two green leaves of gingham and stems of green. It takes a long time to save enough sacks and if any of you feel so disposed I'd like to have you send me a sack. This is the way I remove the letters from the sacks: Roll in good lye soap, put in enough cold water to cover and pour boiling water over them. Cover pail and let soak and steam. Rub, boil and then rinse well.

Your devoted sister, MRS. W. E. WEEKS.

AUBURN, CALIF.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL OF COMFORT SISTERS:

May I come in if I promise not to stay very long? I am a brunette, blue eyed, five feet, six inches tall and weigh 152 pounds. (What can I do to reduce?) I am plump but not fat, but muscular. Have brown, wavy hair and am nineteen years old. I am enclosing a picture of myself and would like to see it in COMFORT.

At first, like all young girls, I read only the stories, recipes and Uncle Charlie's letters, but later I learned that the subjects discussed in the Sisters' Corner were helpful and very interesting.

I will tell you what I did to make my room look new. The bed, table, dresser and footstool were of a maple color. I decided to make the room lighter in color so I scraped off the old varnish and then used sandpaper to make the surface smooth. Then I applied two coats of ivory enamel. It took heaps of pains and patience but it certainly is worth while. There are three French windows and a French door in my room, with the glass marked off in eight panes each, and two other doors, one leading to the other bedroom and the other leading to the front porch, with the upper half of glass. I made "half" curtains for all the windows out of a cream-colored crepe material, and placed them on rods. I crocheted a piece for the outside (glass) door. There is a built in box along two sides of my room which contains shelves for sewing materials, etc. I pasted some flowered wall paper on these and the appearance was much improved. The large wardrobe, desk chair and desk were not varnished. I thought they looked better in the natural maple color. I placed a square mirror in the center of a table and now it resembles an expensive dressing set. I will appreciate letters from the cousins and sisters.

With best wishes to all, MISS EVA M. FERRY.

Sorry, Eva, but a snapshot doesn't reproduce well, so I've pasted your picture in the upper right-hand corner of my COMFORT Sisters' Album, on page 94. You don't mind if I keep it, do you? —Ed.

BATESVILLE, 143 S. Park Ave., IND.

GREETINGS TO OUR DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND THE GREAT COMFORT SISTERHOOD:

I have been waiting for someone to tell us about their COMFORT Kodak Album, as no one seems to own one I will tell you about mine—and then the rest of you will want one also. I am fortunate enough to have COMFORT pen friends in a number of different states, and they, like myself, find great pleasure in taking pictures and we have exchanged "shots" until now not even Henry Ford could afford to purchase my collection. It contains views from far-away Oregon, interesting New York, some fine Western ranch views, not mentioning all the good-looking and smiling faces of the COMFORT folks themselves.

I'm glad we have a COMFORT Sisters' Corner pin. To be sure we will see Mrs. Wilkinson safely through since she went ahead and launched a pin for us.

Have you begun to think about spring housecleaning? It's time for it. Albert A. Rand offers some seasonable advice to us. He says, "Perhaps it's quite a long time since some of our homes have had a thorough cleaning and now that the spring season is here, it is well that we remove some of the rubbish and make room for bright new goods. There's worry, for instance. Isn't there a little of that knocking around your house somewhere, getting under foot and tripping you up every once in a while, just often enough to keep you from being perfectly happy? Then that's one thing that ought to be slated for the ash can right away. A good soap that will remove the stain of worry is Sunshine Soap. It does the work neatly and quickly. Then perhaps there are some of the last year's mistakes and failures lying around, ready to bob up into your face and taunt you the minute you begin to think of something. 'Ha! so you're going after that thing again, are you?' they'll sneer. 'Remember you tried that last year and it didn't work. You can't do anything along that line again. No use to try.' Yes, last year's failures and the memory of them certainly belong with the garbage. If any traces of them refuse to come off readily you'll find that liberal applications of the 'spirit of success' will banish them completely. There's another clutterer of some of your houses that is going to be harder to clean out perhaps than many of the others, yet it certainly needs to go, for it has no part in the well-kept house. That's the sting of those thoughtless words that somebody let fall and the hard feeling they caused. Maybe the one who uttered them didn't mean them and maybe she did, but whether or no, you can't feel right until their memory has been eradicated. And if you want a good eradicator, try the balm of forgiveness, applied freely. It will remove every stain if you apply it full strength. It costs a great deal, sometimes, but it's worth all it costs."

Right along with these thoughts we might also remember:

"Nothing gained by worrying,
By hurrying, by scurrying,
With fretting and with flurrying
The temper's often lost;
And in pursuit of some small prize,
We rush ahead and are not wise,
And find the unwonted exercise
A fearful price has cost."

It's time to go to work and stop visiting so
Good by and good wishes,
MISS EDNA STOCKINGER.

Thanks, Miss Edna, for the snapshot of your cheerful self. It is pasted securely into my COMFORT album.—Ed.

BARGERSVILLE, IND.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I like to read the Sisters' Corner and have taken COMFORT for years and expect to take it as long as I live.

Texas Blue Bonnet, you certainly have my sympathy over losing your fern. It was too bad your first or second letters were not printed so you could have shown your doubting Thomas friends that COMFORT is a real honest-to-goodness paper all the way through. I just want to say right here if there is anyone who doubts about the people getting wheel chairs, that I know for a fact that COMFORT does give wheel chairs as I helped get subscriptions for a little crippled cousin of ours, and he received a fine wheel chair.

Lena, I wish I knew some way to help you in your trouble, but all I can say is to go to the One who is ever ready to help us in our trouble. I am a firm believer in prayer and if you will put your trust in the Heavenly Father and ask him each day to give you strength and wisdom to show you how to overcome this fault of your husband, that He will do it. Try to steal away somewhere alone when you are tired and discouraged, and tell God about it. I like that old song, "What a Friend We Have in Jesus." I shall remember you in my prayers.

I will give you a pen picture of myself. Am five feet, two inches tall, weigh about 150, brown hair, brown eyes and neither a fright nor a beauty. Age between thirty-five and forty. Have been married seventeen years to one of the best of men. We are still all in all to each other.

Love to all. MRS. CECIL BROWN.

ARKANSAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND CONTRIBUTORS TO THE CORNER:

Sitting here in deep meditation, after reading the many splendid letters of the corner, I feel that the efforts of Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters, through the medium of COMFORT, are directly instrumental in bringing about better conditions in our homes, by helping to clear up clouded domestic skies by the cheery, helpful letters that fill the Sisters' Corner. Hats off and Godspeed to you in the great work you are doing. My enthusiasm for an ideal home has arisen to the point that I'm begging Mrs. Wilkinson to grant me admittance for a few minutes so that I might be helpful to some by calling attention to one of my home environments which, if remedied, would make my life more pleasant. As it is I cannot say this.

To begin with, I am musically inclined, having taught music, like good literature and try to cultivate the art of entertaining. On the other hand, my husband, an accomplished musician, seems to abhor the idea of our even trying to play together; as a result, although being supplied with several instruments, our home is almost destitute of music which is disappointing to me, as I find the experience and accomplishments I had attained, are gradually slipping away from me. If I say, "John, get your violin (or cornet) and let's run over the music I received today," the reply is, "Oh, that junk is not fit to listen to," or, "I don't feel like playing." I hope there are no similar cases, and while we do not clash at all, I feel that we are failures in this particular thing.

In conclusion, I think everyone should try to be considerate and congenial toward each other, along the lines that help to make the home a more cheerful and delightful place in which to live.

A LUMBER JACK.

THOMASVILLE, R. R. 3, NO. CAR.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a silent reader of COMFORT for many years and like the Sisters' Corner. I've wanted to write for a long time, but, like many others, lacked confidence.

EVELYN GWENDOLINE CLODFELTER.

I have been an orphan ever since an infant. Married young and we have had many misfortunes, but prayers made every cloud wear a rainbow. Let us all pray more.

I am the mother of two children, a boy three years old and the baby, Evelyn Gwendoline, whose picture I am sending. She is eighteen months old but large for that age.

I never had the privileges when I was a girl that the girls of today have. Some have too much freedom. I think mothers should be more strict.

I have enjoyed this little visit and now I must go. God bless you all.

CHEERFULNESS.

Cheerfulness.—A daughter like Baby Evelyn would make the most unfortunate person in the world cheerful. She has beautiful eyes, as well as the dearest little nose and mouth and ever so many dimples.—Ed.

CICERO, ILL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Will you allow a lonely soul to come into your wonderful circle? I have been reading COMFORT for years but have never dared to intrude. But having read a letter by "A Marine's Wife," I felt I must take a chance. I am thirty years old, brunette, five feet, three inches tall and weigh 150 pounds. Am married ten years and heartbroken over the fact that God has denied me the greatest gift of Life. In my lonesomeness I have turned to adoring and crooning over the babies of my friends and relatives and am very happy when the little youngsters say, "I like Auntie Vosie," (Rose.) Another of my hobbies is in doing all I can for our disabled boys. I am a member of the world-wide known Women's Relief Corps and am proud of the work that is done by the different corps over the entire country. My heart which will electrify you both. There is nothing but good—all good. I ought to be the happiest girl in the world, and should be, but for the shadow that must ever rest upon my dear grandmother's life. I wish you would tell her, for me, that nothing under heaven could ever change my love for her. Under all circumstances, she is my more than mother, who must be first in my heart forever.

Love Will Find the Way

"Ever gratefully and lovingly yours,

"MARIAN."

She despatched a messenger with it; then, with her hand clasped in that of her mother, she sat down to await the return of Mr. Underwood.

It was not long. They had barely begun to consider what their action had best be toward Paul Reade, influenced, as it must be, by their affection for his unhappy mother, when a servant came to request that Marian should join Mr. Underwood in the drawing-room.

She left her mother and went down at once, but in the hall Underwood met her.

"June is waiting for you in the library, little one. Will you go in at once?"

Every particle of blood forsook her cheeks. She lifted her eyes to his, and swift tears filled them. A violent trembling seized her; but after a moment of such deep emotion she shook it off, and answered bravely, if a trifle tremulously:

"Yes; I will see him at once."

He bent forward and kissed her lightly on the brow.

"God give you strength!" he whispered.

He led her to the library, and softly opened the door. He closed it behind her just as gently, and with something of the feeling that oppresses one when a wife is left alone for the last time with her lifeless husband, he walked noiselessly away.

And Marian was alone with June.

She stood there with downcast eyes, never lifting them, and yet feeling his presence there, and he stood grasping the high back of a chair, steeling every nerve against his own inclinations, lest he rush toward her and clasp her to his aching bosom.

He was trembling from head to foot. A terrible rush of emotion swept over him, and he dared not speak until he had again obtained the mastery.

And then, when his heart was again subservient to his will, he crossed the floor and stood before her. She had not heard his footsteps, and yet she felt the near approach. She feared to lift her eyes. She dared not attempt to speak lest her voice fail her.

And then she felt the close clasp of his fingers—June's fingers—upon her own! She felt a thrill pass to the very center of her heart! And then his voice—June's dear voice—spoke to her. The words were ordinary enough, and the voice stiff and dull, but she knew the effort it cost him.

"Marian," he said indescribably, "there is much for which I must ask your forgiveness. How shall I do it?"

Dull as the first sentence was, softly as the second was spoken, the agony of heart was in them both. She caught the fingers that held hers swiftly, and lifted her eyes to his.

"Oh, June," she cried, "can't you understand that there can never be any talk of forgiveness between you and me? The past is dead and buried beyond resurrection, but at least there can be no bitterness in either heart against the other. You have come for an eternal farewell. Let us speak it as quickly as possible."

The tone was strained and choked. She had withdrawn her hand, as if she could bear contact with him no longer, and he passed his hand across his brow wearily, clearing it of the cold moisture that had gathered there.

He did not even hear the close of her speech, apparently, for without taking note of it, he said, miserably:

"And there are things of which you need forgiveness, Marian. Could you not have trusted me a little more, dear? Could you not have understood that nothing could have come between you and me? Did you think that your father's faults or sin or crimes would have weighed a jot against your love? Oh, Marian, why did you not trust me?"

"Don't!" she whispered, putting up her hand as if to defend herself from a blow; "don't! It is eternally too late now! You must not forget—her!"

"I do not—I do not; but at least it can do no harm for us to understand each other now. We know already, and God knows! No more harm can be done than has been already. It can not injure your purity nor my honor for me to tell you that no wrong he could have committed, no matter how great, would have broken my heart from yours. You were my betrothed wife, Marian. Think, dear; my betrothed wife! Was there so little of your confidence, then, due to me? Could you not come to me in the affliction that lay upon your soul? Did you not dare trust the man who loved you with the secret that shadowed your life?"

"But you don't understand it all. Go back, June; think of that night at the opera. Don't you remember? Don't you recall your own words about—insanity?"

"Insanity?"

"Yes. Don't you remember?"

"I do; but what had that to do with you?"

"You don't know what my birthday-present was on the day that followed, do you? You had given me your love, and that was the most precious thing that earth or heaven held. I went home, scarcely able to bear my happiness, only to be told that my mother was that thing which you most despised on earth—a lunatic! I had never suspected it, and the hardest part to bear was the knowledge that you would despise me. I could not tell you, June—I could not!"

"Your mother?"

"Yes, dear. Now you understand; you see how impossible it would have been for me to face the disgust that would have crossed your brow; you see how impossible it would have been for me to hear the words from your lips: 'I love you, but we must part.' Oh, June, don't blame, but pity, me!"

"And do you think I would have spoken them? Do you think I could have spoken them? I can hear the cruelty of those foolish words now as I uttered them in that box. But some one there said, 'Love is lord of all.' It is true, Marian; madness had not threatened the woman I loved. Oh, if you had but told me! I would have taken you and shielded you and held you in my arms, so that harm could not have touched you. And it was that, after all, that divided us! It was my own brutal words, my own cursed folly, that recoiled upon my own head! Darling, could you not see that my love was so great that mountains of shame and humiliation and sorrow would have been as nothing for it to overcome? Oh, Marian, Marian, this is more than I can bear!"

He turned away, and a heavy groan left his white lips; but she caught his arm quickly.

"Good by!" she cried hoarsely. "I am going now. We should not have risked it. I can bear my own suffering, but not the sight of yours. It is eternal, June—it must be! God bless you forever and forever!"

Her voice was choked with tears, her face white with anguish.

He turned to her to say farewell, as she had bidden him; but the sight was too much for him, as it would have been for any man who loved as he did. He caught her in his arms; he forgot Anne Gordon, he forgot his honor, he forgot everything.

"I can't say it!" he groaned, with his lips upon hers, her body pressed closely against his breast. I can't say it. I love you so that my lips will not form the words you have commanded. You are more than life, more than soul, more than heaven to me. Oh! my darling, my darling, did you not know that if you but trusted, love could find the way through any calamity?"

"Love has found the way!"

"The sweet voice came to them from the conservatory, laden with the breath of flowers, tender as the thrill of a harp-string in heaven. They looked up. It was Anne Gordon.

and sympathies are all with "Our Boys" and I am never happier than when I am planning some new way of raising money for relief work. Each of the 38 members feels just as I do and now that the new staff of officers has been initiated we shall endeavor to make this a promising year. My only regret is that so many people have forgotten all the promises made to our boys when they left for "over there," and it hurts me to see so many of our lads walking the streets, looking for work. I congratulate our Hoosier sister, from Mishawakee, Indiana, on her work for the boys. I have also enjoyed Aunt Sally Lou's letter, but want to say how much easier it is to get acquainted with your neighbors in the country than in a big city. I was born in Chicago and lived there for twenty years, and with the exception of my immediate neighbors I was a stranger in a strange land. At the age of twenty I married and went to live on a little farm in Michigan. I became acquainted with all my neighbors in all adjoining towns for miles around. We had our Saturday night barn dances, our Sunday prayer meetings, and twice a month our Ladies' Aid Society met at the different homes. I certainly enjoyed the five years of my farm life and now I'm back in the city again, for Cicero is only a little sub-division of Chicago, and I'm as lonesome as can be. I would like to hear from any sister who would care to write.

Wishing good old COMFORT and dear Mrs. Wilkinson success,

A LONELY SISTER.

PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I do so much enjoy the sisters' letters, they are so real and helpful in many ways.

I want to ask their opinion on a subject that I haven't seen discussed before.

What do you think of our American girls marrying foreigners?

Also another question; just whom should we designate as foreigners, those born in America of foreign parents or those born in foreign countries and becoming naturalized, or neither?

This intermarriage among the working people and middle classes is becoming more and more frequent.

WILD ROSE.

OAKDALE, TENNESSEE.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Will you allow one to enter from the Cumberland Mountains of Tennessee? Oakdale is located in Morgan County, on the banks of the Big Emory River. Mountains rise almost perpendicular on every side, and the Cincinnati Southern Railroad enters the town from north and south through tunnels.

The name of our bungalow is "Brookcroft," and signifies "hid away." A little, winding stream almost encircles the bungalow, and only a few feet away, and is a constant reminder of the perpetuity of life. A rustic footbridge is built across this stream, connecting the yards with a spring of pure water. Overlooking the footbridge are two graceful hemlock trees, and as I look upon them in all their majesty, I am reminded of the lines by Joyce Kilmer, which read:

WILLIAM ANGEL BURTON.

"A tree that looks at God all day,
And lifts its leafy arms to pray."

Away from the rocky borders of the creek are the forest covered hills; intermingled with the tall trees are to be found the beautiful rhododendron and mountain laurel. When the summer storms pass over I have admired the lofty and serene temper of the mountains. They seem to extract from the assaults of the storms new beauty, and to nurture the lofty fountains that the vales below may be latterly blessed. I think Nature would teach us many noble lessons if we would open our minds to same.

As you climb the hills about our home the tinkling of cowbells can be heard for miles around. Cattle roam at large in the Cumberlands of Tennessee, and bells are strapped around their necks. Merchants carry cowbells in stock for the benefit of their customers. There are different sizes and tones to the bells. It is a babel of confusion to the stranger, but not so to the owner of a cow. When he wants to locate his cow he gets out on the mountain-side and listens for his bell. In the evening it is a beautiful sight to see a large herd of cattle making their way down the mountain-side to the homes of their owners.

So I am content to remain "hid away" in our little home here in the mountains. I helped to win the war by acting as county chairman of the woman's division of the Morgan County Liberty Loan Committee throughout all the drives that were made, and also acting as secretary to my husband who was the Federal food administrator for the county. It was a privilege to serve in this way, but I now have no ambitions whatever to hold political office in any capacity. I am satisfied to remain in my home, do my own housekeeping, and to take care of my precious little baby boy, William Angel Burton. His middle name was my maiden name. He is the only child now in our home. His little brother, J. D. Jr., died at the age of about three years, with less than twenty-four hours' illness. This happened a little over a year ago. And so our home has not been without its shadows.

The American Red Cross through its bureau of pictures made a moving picture of "Brookcroft Bungalow" and the surrounding country in a reel, entitled, "My Brother's Keeper," and if any of the readers have chanced to see this film of motion pictures you will recall the rustic footbridge and Scotch collie dog. This collie and little J. D. Jr., used to play together on this bridge. But now the little boy is gone forever. But there is hardly a day passes but what I think of the lines by Eugene Field:

"Pitty-pat and tippy-toe,
All day long they come and go."

I enclose the picture of William Angel Burton, age about ten months, when his picture was made.

Yours cordially, MRS. J. D. BURTON.

HOLTON, IND.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I am a born Hoosier and live near a small town of about 250 inhabitants. We have a six-room cottage with forest trees for shade. Am a great lover of flowers but this year will have none as sickness caused me to lose all my dahlias, canna and gladiolus bulbs and I could save no seeds for the same reason. Seeds aren't expensive but husband had but little work last winter (he is a carpenter by trade) and trying to pay for our home. I will have to look at the empty flower beds and think "It might have been."

I do not like town or city life but love the big outdoors. I like to have a garden, chickens, a cow and bees. I pity the poor city children and how much they miss in life. Even those who are fortunate enough to hear the high-class music don't know what sweet music is unless they have been in the country and heard the birds singing, cattle lowing, horses neighing to each other, the bark of the faithful dog as he runs by his beloved master's side, chirping of crickets, frogs croaking and afar off the faint bleating of little lambs and the tinkle of cowbells, even the locust as he sings out his prediction of a hot day. Can any such sweet music be wrought by man? Daily surrounded by such music and the beautiful colors of nature, how can one grow tired of the country as the color scheme and music changes with the rolling around of the seasons? The city is a continual rumble of cars and the same bleak walls the year around.

Mrs. M. T. Haynes, if you will visit us you may stay until you satisfy yourself that husband and I do not quarrel; no praise to me though, as it takes two to quarrel and he will not. My husband once made the remark: "If I had to quarrel with a woman to live with her I'd leave first," and I today am a better woman by thinking deeply of that remark. Sisters, we are all human but we women are too apt to nag. Our husbands work hard, often denying themselves pleasures for their wives and families. Of course the women work hard as a rule too, sometimes when they are hardly able to be going. I think the sister who leaves her supper dishes in order to be with hubby won't have it said that her husband went to other places evenings because she denied him her company. My experience, when we first went to housekeeping I thought everything simply had to be done up in apple-pie order and as we were not overblessed with this world's goods I did work for others. I was often too tired to even carry on pleasant conversation with my husband, and the conversation I led was business and financial worries each evening. So one night he said, "Now dear, I work hard all day which I realize you do too; when evening comes let's rest physically and mentally and let financial matters alone. Then at the end of every two weeks we will go over the books together." And from that day I have tried to be a true pal to him. We have a boy twelve years old, and a baby girl four months old. I sometimes thing hubby and I are as full of mischief and play as our boy. I believe, as Mrs. J. M. Comer, in teaching children to leave things alone. We could go anywhere with our boy when he was smaller and he wasn't handling and meddling with everything as I have seen many children do, often spoiling pictures, book bindings, etc., by fingering them, climbing into chairs to reach things. We taught our boy he might look but did not have to handle things. Neither do I think ghost stories should be told to or before children. We do not burn a lamp at night so our boy isn't afraid of darkness. I know a man past middle age who confesses he is and always was afraid after dark. When asked if when a child ghost stories were told to him his reply was, "Yes," and when he entered a dark room older ones would say, "Be careful or the 'booger man' will get you." So you see through parents' thoughtlessness his whole life was spoiled to a certain extent.

I think we should try to find good in others instead of repeating things we hear. I often think of a story I once heard of an old lady who was noted for always saying good of those she spoke of. One woman said, "I bet she would say something good about the devil." The others thought surely not of him, so they went to the old lady's house and during their stay spoke of the old fellow. "Well," the old lady said, "he is persevering."

A sister mentioned having a postal card shower on her wedding anniversary. My fourteenth wedding anniversary was May 19th and on June 29th I will be thirty-four years young. A card shower will be greatly appreciated.

With best wishes, sisters, MRS. M. H. MEVIUS.

A Prayer

"Oh, let me live the fullness of each day. Let me be grateful for the happiness it brings. Help me endure its sorrows.

"Let me awake each morning with a song in my heart and grant my voice the strength to give it music.

"Teach me to be cheerful and patient. Help me be silent when I feel wrathful or resentful. Show me the value of a kindly word, the warmth of a smile.

"Keep watch over my heart lest any thought of malice enter there and guard my words that I may not speak ill of others. Help me each time I see another's fault to acknowledge one to my own account. Make me just and let me keep faith with humanity that I may live in peace and pleasure with my associates.

"Teach me my duty and help me that I may not shrink from any sorrow or suffering I may endure in its performance, knowing how worth while is a clear conscience.

"Keep my thoughts and my lips pure and my spirit undefiled.

"Grant that I may ever be satisfied in my own little world, content in the wonder and simplicity of an all-wise plan."

CRANDALL, S. DAK.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

To answer Lena I will say that I certainly do believe in love at first sight. Nearly seven years ago I married a man I loved the very first day I met him and he has not failed me in any way. He was a widower with two children and I a widow with one child and we are all happy in our home, though it is not the finest in the world by any means. There is a companionship between us all; we play with our children as though we were children once more.

To cure those small boys of fighting, try putting them in a small room together and telling them to fight it out and that they are to stay there until they can behave or until they are in good humor again.

As to economy, I believe it is my second name, anyway it begins with E. I have learned to use flour sacks even for table-cloths and they can be made very pretty by crocheting and placing it between the sacks, with an edging to match around them. They are easily laundered.

Use stockings for underskirts; cut open the stockings, sew together and hem or crochet around the bottom. I make most of our underclothing of flour sacks.

I am exactly five feet tall, very dark brown hair, blue eyes and have a great propensity to tease.

Happy wife and mother,

MRS. HENRY J. BOUDREAU.

Caps for the Baby Tots

Wreath of Roses. An original design by Mrs. Margaret Turney, Md. The six roses, with slightly scalloped edges, are of red, leaves and circle of green, appliqued on bleached muslin.

Infant's Cap in Clover Leaf Crochet

THIS dainty little model which is designed for spring and summer wear, is made of cream-colored silkatine. Work is begun in the center of the crown with a ch 5, join in ring, ch 3.

1st round—29 tr c in ring, sl st to top ch 3, ch 5.

2nd round—1 sl st in 2nd tr c, ch 5, 1 sl st in 4th tr c, repeat around, making in all 15 chains, join last one by sl st to 1st st of 1st ch, sl st to center of this ch.

INFANT'S CAP IN CLOVER LEAF CROCHET.

3rd round—Ch 5, 1 s c under ch in last round, repeat around, same as in last round and join in same manner.

4th round—Same as 3rd round.

5th round—7 d c under each ch 5, join by sl st.

6th round—7 s c on 7 d c, * ch 15, join last 5 sts in ring, ch 5, 1 s c in ring, ch 5, 1 s c in ring, ch 5, 1 s c in ring. Under 1st ch 5 work 1 s c, 2 d c, 2 tr c, ch 1, 2 tr c, 2 d c, 1 s c, repeat the same under other 2 chs 5, joining the center of 3rd group to 1st of 7 s c, 15 s c over ch 10 back to center wheel, 7 s c on 7 d c, repeat from * 13 more times, making 14 clover leaves in all. Break thread.

7th round—Join thread to center ch 1 of last clover leaf, ch 4, join to center ch 1 of 1st group of doubles of next leaf, ch 5, 6 or 7 according to how one works, and join to center ch 1 of center or 2nd group of leaf. This chain should be just long enough to make the center of the cap about as large as a saucer. Join to 1st ch, ch 3.

8th round—3 d c under ch 4, 9 d c under next ch, 4 d c under next ch 4, repeat all around joining to 1st ch 3, ch 5.

9th round—1 tr c on 2nd d c, ch 2, sk 1, 1 tr c, repeat around, join to ch 5, ch 3.

10th round—2 d c in sp, 1 d c on 1 tr c, repeat around, join, sl st along over spaces to the space over 2nd clover leaf.

11th round—1 clover leaf, then over last row sl st over 2 sps, 1 clover leaf, 13 more leaves, the 3rd group of the last one being just over space above the 2nd leaf from the center of the back of the cap. This leaves space over 4 leaves for the back of the neck. Sl st to center, join and break thread.

12th round — Beginning on the side (right) of the cap shown in illustration make 1 sl st in center of 1st group of 1st clover, ch 6 or 7, 1 sl st in center of 2nd group of same clover, ch 3, join to next leaf, repeat working as in 7th round, after sl st in center of last clover leaf, turn, ch 1.

13th round—Same as 8th round.

14th round—Same as 9th round.

15th round—Same as 10th round.

16th round—15 clover leaves.

17th round—Chain completely around the cap.

18th round—Work as in 7th round.

19th round—Spaces all around.

20th round—Scalloped edge all around as follows: Ch 5, sk 1 sp, 1 s c in next sp, ch 5, sk 1 sp, 1 s c, repeat around, join sl st to center first ch, scallop 9 tr c under next ch, 1 s c under 3rd ch. Repeat, join and break thread.

Square Centerpiece in Spiderweb Effect

BY HELEN P. METZGER.

Crocheted of No. 50 cotton with No. 11 steel hook this lace will be about three inches in width, and the finished centerpiece 14 inches in size.

Chain of 51 stitches.

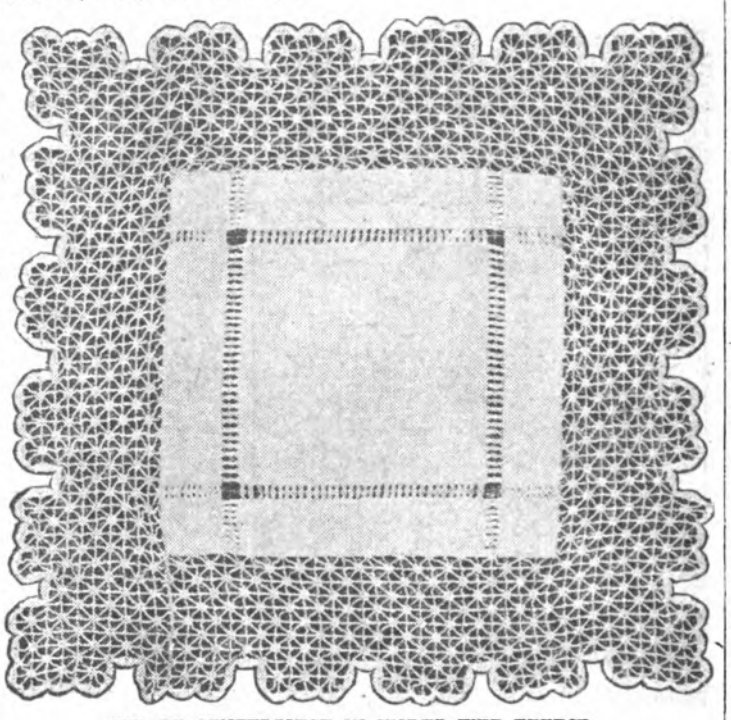
1st row—S c in first st of ch, * ch 6, sk 4, tr c in next, ch 6, sk 4, 3 s c in next three sts. Repeat from *, ending with s c in last st of ch.

2nd row—Ch 10, * 1 s c over 6 ch, 1 s c in tr c, 1 s c over next 6 ch, ch 5, tr c in middle of 3 s c, ch 5, repeat from *, ending with tr c in last s c.

3rd row—Ch 10, * 3 s c in 3 s c, ch 6, tr c in tr c, ch 6 and repeat from * ending with tr c in 5th st of 10th ch.

4th row—* Ch 5, tr c in middle of 3 s c, ch 5, s c over ch 6, s c in tr c, s c over ch 6, repeat from *, ending with a s c in 5th st of 10th ch.

Repeat these four rows of directions twice, making two rows of blocks or webs. When beginning the third row, sl st over one web, making the third row to consist of only four webs. When finishing this row, ch 10 as a foundation for the added web. Turn, s c in first stitch of this ch, ch 6, sk 4, a tr c in next ch 6, sk 4, s c in corner of last web made. Repeat directions from first row.



The 4th, 5th and 6th rows consist of five webs each. The 7th row consists of four webs, the 8th, 9th and 10th rows of five webs, the 11th of four webs, the 12th, 13th and 14th of five webs each, the 15th of four webs, the 16th and 17th of five webs each.

When beginning the 18th row, work over three webs, then break thread. This makes corner scallop. Skip one web and attach thread to corner of next web. Work over this last web (repeating the four rows of directions), then turn and work alongside over five webs. Make six scallops along each side (including the two corner scallops). Join with needle and thread.

Edging

Join thread to corner. In first space make 2 s c, 2 d c, 2 tr c. In second space, 2 tr c, 2 d c, 2 s c. This makes a tiny scallop over each web. Repeat around.

Sew lace to a square of linen of suitable size. This lace may also be used for yokes, runners, scarf ends, etc. The interested worker will discover many pleasing variations of the pattern.

For the Edge

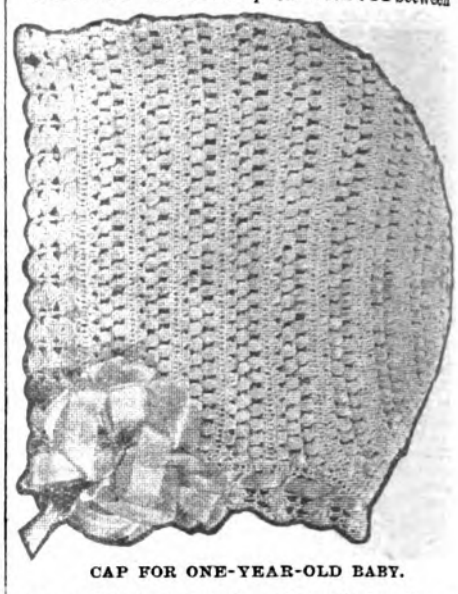
In the corner space of front make a shell of 2 d c (ch 5, 2 d c), repeat twice, ch 5, sk 1 sp, fasten with a single s c in double, * ch 5, sk 2 sps, sh in next, ch 5, sk 2 sps, fasten in d c, repeat from * to corner, sk 1 sp before corner sp, sh in that sp, and repeat the edge around back of neck.

Any pretty border may be used instead of this, or a picot edge may be added to this pattern.

If the turnback is not desired the 46th, 47th and 48th rows of spaces may be omitted. Any attractive filet insertion can be used for the front of the bonnet.

Cap in Puff-Stitch Crochet

Materials. White mercerized crochet cotton No. 30 and No. 12 steel hook. A cap, made by these directions will fit a year-old baby.



Work is begun as is usual in the center of the crown by a ch 7, join to form ring.

2nd round—11 d c in ring, join, ch 2.

3rd round—23 d c on double, working through both loops of each stitch, join, ch 2.

4th round—5 d c in first double, turn, draw loop through first d c, making a slip st which draws 5 d c together into a puff. Ch 3, turn, sk 2 d c and working on the right side make another puff in the 3rd double, repeat around making 10 puffs in all, join, ch 3.

5th round—Make two puffs with ch 2 between each puff in last round, or 19 puffs in all, join, ch 2.

6th round—4 d c between each puff, join, ch 2.

7th round—1 d c in each d c, working through both loops of each st, join, ch 2.

8th round—1 puff, ch 3, sk 2, 1 puff, repeat around, join, ch 2 or 3 as seems best not to have work drawing.

9th round—2 puffs between each two first puffs, 1 puff between next two puffs, repeat, join, ch 2.

10th round—3 d c between each puff in last round, join, ch 2.

11th round—1 d c in each d c, join, ch 2.

12th round—1 puff, ch 2, sk 2 d c, 1 puff, repeat, join, ch 2.

13th round—1 puff between each puff, ch 3, repeat, join, ch 2.

14th round—3 d c between each puff, repeat, join, ch 2.

15th round—1 d c on each d c, join, ch 2.

16th round—Same as 12th round.

17th round—Same as 13th round.

18th and 19th rounds—Same as 14th and 15th rounds.

20th and 21st rounds—Same as 12th and 13th rounds.

22nd and 23rd rounds—Same as 14th and 15th rounds.

24th round—Same as 12th round, making 67 puffs, then finish balance of round by working 1 d c on each d c, join to first puff, sl st over puff and ch 1 st on ch beyond second puff, ch 2.

25th round—One is now on first row of front, 1 puff between 2nd and 3rd puffs in last round, ch 2, 1 puff, repeat, ch 3, turn.

26th round—3 d c between each puff, ch 3, turn.

27th round—1 d c on each d c, ch 3, turn.

Continue working in this manner, finishing the front with two rows of puffs, two rows of doubles, repeat these four rows three times more. After completing 43 rows of doubles, slip around neck of cap to beginning of this row, then ch 3, 1 sh of 7 trebles in first d c, 1 d c on 3rd d c, 1 sh on 5th d c, repeat, two more rows of shells on shells, break thread.

Across the neck of cap work one row of spaces for running ribbon of 1 d c, ch 3, 1 d c, repeat two rows of shells the same as finish the front.

Finish the front and neck with ribbon and add full rosettes to the sides.

Loop Edging

This is pretty for either huck or Turkish towels if made of heavy thread. It is made in the length and sewed to the edge after completing.

Ch 9, turn.

1st row—1 d c in 4th st, ch 2, sk 2, 2 d c, ch 3.

2nd and 3rd rows—Same as 1st row. End of 3rd row, ch 9, fasten in top of double of 1st row, turn.

4th row—15 s c under ch 9, ch 2, ending as usual.

Next 3 rows same as 1st row.

7th row—End as in 3rd row, turn.

8th row—8 s c, ch 9, fasten to top of loop end of 3rd row, turn, 7 s c under ch, 1 picot of ch 3, 7 s c, 8 s c under ch 9, end as usual. Now repeat pattern.

Between 2nd and 3rd loops ch 7, turn, 1 s c, 2 d c, 1 p, 2 d c, 1 p, 2 d c, 1 p, 2 d c, 1 s c under ch, finish loop.

Repeat pattern from 1st row.

Cross-stitch patterns can be worked on any square mesh material very easily if the weave is coarse enough, otherwise to copy a design cross stitch canvas is necessary. When this is not obtainable, however, mosquito netting put through a stiff starch, ironed and then pulled until the meshes are straight and true, may be substituted.

A simple scallop is added to one side if one desires to use the pattern as an edging.

Maryland Beauty Rose. Copied from an old quilt block of this pattern by Mrs. Margaret Turney, Md. The center and four corner roses of red, leaves and stem of green, appliqued on unbleached muslin.

A BEAUTIFUL ROSE FILET WHICH MAY BE USED IN MANY WAYS.

New Bead Chains

At present the desire seems to be to make chains a part of the color scheme of one's costume. For this reason bead chains of any color can easily be procured. Some of the most interesting new ones are made of a combination of beads finished with a silk tassel.

These are about 30 inches long. When the chain is put around the neck the tassel hangs in the front, forming a deep V line of the beads.

A very pretty combination of color which can be finished with a tassel of the shade preferred can be made by stringing three deep blue beads, three deep green, then a yellow, a nile green, a yellow, three brown, a gold, a crimson, a gold, three dark blue again and so on until the length is complete.

A blue, brown, green or gold tassel about four inches long will harmonize with this combination.

Belfast Curtain Edging

Of ecru or white No. 40 crochet cotton begin with ch 8, 3 d c in first 3 sts, making 1 blk, ch 5, turn, 1 blk in space formed by first ch, ch 5, turn, 1 blk in space, 9 d c, extra in same space to form a scallop, fasten to first block, turn, 1 s c on each of 9 d c, ch 5, 1 blk in space.

CURTAIN EDGING.

Make 3 rows of alternate blks and sps and repeat scallop.

Mending Woolen Skirts

Soft woolen material tears easily, especially when there are nails, etc., to catch in skirts; and yet it is hard to mend them inconspicuously. One dressmaker, who has done mending in her poorer days, recommends drawing the torn edges together with silk thread and then placing underneath a piece of the fabric the size of the tear, like a patch. Hold this temporarily in place with court-plaster and mending tissue, and then darn with the tiniest of stitches across the torn edges, catching this lightly to the patch underneath, pressing with an iron slightly warmed.

Basket of Tulips. An original design by Mrs. Phil Prinz, Texas. The basket is of brown outlined on edges with darker brown. The tulips are of orange, pink, blue and yellow, the leaves of green, each outlined with the same shade of green.

The Fundamental Principles of the Radiophone

THE radio telephone or Radiophone, as it is commonly called, is an outgrowth of the wireless telegraph.

It is necessary in order to give the uninitiated an idea of the fundamental principles of the radio telephone, first to consider the principles of the radio telegraph. There have been extensive improvements in the radio telegraph during the past few years, and it is due to these improvements that we are now able to listen each night to the musical and other entertainments being held many miles away without the aid of connecting wires.

The original radio telegraph consisted of a spark coil, a gap for the spark to jump across, a key to start and stop the spark, and an aerial to convey the electrical energy into the air. Although this crude arrangement is now obsolete, it is necessary to know something of the spark gap set in order to understand the complex systems employed at the large broadcasting stations at the present time.

Nearly everyone has at some time watched a pebble dropped into a pool of still water, and seen the little ripples as they start in a small circle and expand into larger and larger circles as they get further away from the point where the pebble struck the water. The pebble caused a disturbance in the water and set the little waves in motion, and as they traveled in all directions, it was of course necessary for them to expand. Did you ever notice that these little waves, as they traveled along and their circles widened, became fainter and finally you were unable to see them at all? You will understand, if you have not already observed, that the larger the stone we throw into the water, the larger the wave will be and the further it will travel. Still another fact which governs the size and distance of a wave is the force with which the stone is thrown.

The wave that results from throwing a stone into the water very well illustrates the principles that govern the movement of a radio wave produced by a disturbance of the ether. Instead of a stone, we use an electrical discharge and in order to make a bigger wave that will travel a long distance, we store up a large amount of electricity and let it loose in a mass. Ordinarily electricity will not flow through an air space, but requires a conductor. In storing up the electrical energy, we have such a large amount of electricity which is under a high pressure, that it readily jumps across the small air gap when let loose. This air gap or "spark gap" as it has been named, is connected on one side to the aerial and on the other side to the ground. During the time the spark is jumping across the gap, a disturbance is created in the ether surrounding the aerial. This disturbance is very similar to the disturbance created in the water by the stone and the waves which the former creates in the ether are also very similar to the waves in the water. The waves in the ether are of course electrical in character and are known as electro-magnetic waves. These waves travel at a speed of one hundred eighty-six thousand miles per second which is the speed of light. As in the case of the waves caused by throwing the pebble into the pool, the distance the radio waves travel depends upon the size of the electrical charge by which they are produced. Like the water waves, the electro-magnetic waves become smaller (of less amplitude) after the first impulse of the discharge, therefore we have a wave which diminishes or, as expressed in Radio terms, it damps. As long as we keep the key depressed, a wave train will be sent out which is shaped like Figure 1 below.

The new system of Radio transmission, which is now in use in nearly all trans-oceanic and trans-continental stations, is known as the "continuous wave" or "C W" system. The difference which is of the most interest to us is in the shape of the wave sent out. As its name implies, the wave is continuous and does not diminish nor "damp." In consequence of the latter characteristic this system also bears the name of "Undamped Radio" transmission but it and the C W are one and the same. Below we have the Dampened wave (Fig. 1) in comparison with the Undampened wave (Fig. 2).

There are many methods of obtaining these undamped waves, but at the present time the Audion tube is coming into very common use, especially for the low-powered sets. The large stations which work long distances employ the Arc transmitter and also a specially designed generator. The large ocean liners nearly all employ the Audion or vacuum tubes. Any of these may be used to transmit wireless telephone as well as wireless telegraph; however, the tube transmitter is by far the most efficient, and is now in general use.

The method of transmitting speech and music by means of the Audion tubes will be fully explained in a later article. In the July issue we shall take up the principles of the radiophone receiver.

Questions relating to the radiophone, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Radio Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department.

Questions and Answers

Q.—I have an antenna in my attic. It is well insulated, also have a good ground. Is it possible that this draws lightning and liable to set the roof on fire?
J. W., Mich.

A.—Have no fear of it. There will be no more danger that the lightning will strike your aerial than there is that it will strike the gas pipe. A properly grounded aerial is a protection against lightning as it acts as a lightning rod.

Q.—How far will a mineral detector receive music?
F. L. D., Tex.

A.—A mineral detector is not reliable for music over long distances. We would say about five miles.

Q.—Is it necessary to have an outside antenna to receive the music? R. T. L., Ill.

A.—It is not necessary to have the aerial outside, a wire may be stretched in the attic or a loop may be used if you are only a short distance from the broadcasting station.

Q.—Is it possible to light the filament of Audions with the house lighting current if a step-down transformer is used? D. I. R., Tenn.

A.—Yes, but a disagreeable hum will probably be heard, and it is more satisfactory to use the storage battery.

Q.—Is it possible to light the filaments of the Audion tubes with dry batteries? O. C. E., Mo.

A.—It is possible but very unsatisfactory as the dry cells will last only a few minutes. Storage batteries are necessary for efficient work.

Q.—Will the music be broadcasted all summer?
F. G., Okla.

A.—Yes, so far as can be learned now there will be programs during the coming summer.

Q.—How long should a receiving antenna be to receive the radiophone concerts? S. T. N., Wisc.

A.—A single wire 100 feet long is a very good aerial for radiophone receiving stations.

Q.—Is a gas pipe good for a ground for a radio set? L. S., Ga.

A.—Yes, it will serve very well, but you should have another ground for lightning protection.

Q.—Where can I obtain complete plans for making a wireless telephone receiver? A. F. H., Ind.

A.—There are several companies making such plans. You will receive a leaflet in a few days from one of the radio supply companies.

Q.—Do any radio companies sell crystal receiving sets for radio phone concerts? E. K., N. H.

A.—Yes. If you are near a broadcasting station you will be able to purchase a good crystal set from any dealer.

Q.—What telephone headsets are considered good?
D. P. L., Ohio.

A.—There are many good headsets on the market. You will receive descriptive circular and price list in a few days from one of the reliable makers.

Q.—What are some of the best radio books to read in order to get a working knowledge of radio?
R. T. U., Ky.

A.—We are mailing you a list of some of the latest and best books on radio and of the radio dealers who advertise in this and other magazines and who will be able to furnish you with any of these books.

Comfort's League of Cousins

us willing to be California Sunkist at any time. I mean any time except July and August, Shirley. During those months I would rather have you scatter a little of the Yosemite Valley snow.

Shirley, every time I read letters like yours which take a hand in describing all of California's grandeur and glories, I commence to ponder why Fate has been unkind enough to keep me away from the Pacific Coast. And then, the next day, perhaps, I meet somebody who violently knocks everything Californian and I am again reconciled to my lot as a Brooklynite. Apparently California is a State that you either love much or don't like at all—no middle ground is possible. I have found that Billy is inclined to always regard California with favor because the last census showed how large was the State's Goat population.

As you are a newspaper worker, Shirley, and also a sunshine distributor, I fancy that your job must be on the Merced County "Sun" and not on your rival, the "Star." It stands to reason that one could not scatter sunlight from a Star. You are risking a great deal, Shirley, when you offer to publish our Family's poetry output. You do not know how many followers of the Muse are among the cousins. I assure you in advance that you will have to issue several Special Poetry Editions to care for the selections of odes, sonnets and lyrics which will musically flood the office of the Sun. Do send me a copy of the first Poetry Number of your paper, Shirley. If I do not read it, Billy will be sure to be able to put it to good use. As to my contributing, you can just bet all your Merced County sunshine that I could write an editorial on the High Cost of Living that would be right from the heart—and pocketbook. But I have to work so hard to keep up with the ascensions and flights of this aforesaid Cost that I have no time left to throw in any selections for your Sunny Journal. I have just paid a dollar for one dozen of what purport to be Albermarle Pippins, but I'm sure any Virginia Cousin would disdain to recognize the juiceless fruit as the product of Old Dominion orchards. But my dollar was a good juicy one, I assure you.

I hope you didn't get fooled in the election results when you cast your first vote so close to April Fool's Day, Shirley. If the time ever comes when you run for mayor of Merced, I hope it will be on the Sunshine Party's ticket and that the election will be held Mac 1st.

PAYETTE, IDAHO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I will write you once more as I did before, but I hope Billy don't get this letter again.

I live with my father and mother. I also have two brothers and a sister. My sister has been married for three years. My father owns a small ranch of 800 acres. On 500 acres of this land we raise wheat and barley. The rest of the land is pasture. Our ranch is twenty-five miles from Payette and fourteen miles from Emmett. We have thirty-five head of cattle and horses and about 125 Leghorn chickens.

This country is rather hilly and in the winter I have a pair of skis to travel down hill on and, believe me, I travel some!

I have one brother older than myself and one younger, and in the season we have all kinds of fun hunting and trapping wild animals. Some winters the snow gets so deep we can run coyotes down and don't have to bother with traps. In the spring, summer and fall we are too busy for much fun, only in the evening we can join some of our friends and go swimming.

Well, I expect you would like to know what I look like: I am five feet, eight inches high and weigh 135 pounds. I have dark hair and dark complexion, and am eighteen years old.

I would like to hear from some of the cousins and I will try to answer all of their letters and tell them something more of the country.

Your new nephew, LEO DOUGHERTY.

Leo, if your ranch is a small one, what do you call a big one out in Idaho? Your dad must own a good-sized slice of Payette County. Do you know, Leo, that this ranch home of yours is bigger than the city ranch that Billy roams over so much these summer days? I mean Prospect Park. This municipal pasture for the use of two-legged and four-legged city animals and Fords only covers 536 acres—just about as much as you plant to wheat and barley each year! When I told all this to Billy and gave him the statistics in the case—for statistics are as dear as clover to Bill—he blinked his eyes enviously and said: "Gosh, Uncle Lisha, but these Western guys certainly have the life! Think of you and me, Uncle, cooped up here and buying our wheatena and pearl barley in pasteboard boxes! We ought to do a little prospecting some day, Uncle Lisha, out along the Snake River where Cousin Leo has his ranch. You love apples, so, Uncle, and I see there's a little town called Apple Valley right near where Leo goes skiing about and chasing wild Leghorns and coyotes. And I know I should like to work at harvesting barley—when it's right in the milk. Yum, yum!"

"I'll bet you'd harvest it all right, Bill," I replied; "but I guess you and I'll have to hang around Brooklyn a while longer. Until railroad tickets get cheaper, Bill, we'll have to keep on harvesting our wheat and barley from a grocer's five-foot shelf and not from Cousin Leo's 500 acres."

And although Billy was disappointed, he resigned himself to a little second-hand traveling by studying the map of Idaho and langorously murmuring to himself such magic names as Fruitland, Homedale and Garden Valley. I think your letter has made an Idaho fan out of Billy, Leo, and that he prefers your state now to Missouri—which has been his first choice up to now. Every time Bill goes to Prospect Park for the next few weeks, he'll be estimating to himself how the whole place would look if it were waving with wheat and barley.

KASSON, WEST VIRGINIA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

After receiving the March COMFORT and reading the mysterious letter that got Bill's goat and had him worrying overtime, I decided to try and solve it for the benefit of your beloved and valuable animal. In less than an hour I believed I turned the trick, as follows: In the alphabet this mysterious cousin used to spell his name and address, he used always the letter just before the one he should have taken ordinarily. Thus, B became A, C was B, D turned into C, etc., all down the line. According to this solution his name and address of Cfoojf Hjmcfsutpo, Njmops, Op Ehlpub, becomes easily readable as Bennie Gilbertson, Milnor, No. Dakota. If this is not correct, for the sake of Billy's peace of mind try and make him believe it is until you hear again from the guy who wrote the letter.

I have not written to Bennie—or should I say Cfoojf?—as I have not cotton seed to send him—no cotton being grown so far North as where I live.

With all good luck to you and your whiskered co-worker, I remain,

As ever, ALVA W. HOVATTER.

Thanks a lot, Alva, you wise bird, for bringing your brail cells into operation on Cousin Cfoojf's letter and solving the cryptic difficulty for the Family. Of course you are right, and it seems very simple now that we know the secret of Cousin Bennie's new alphabet. But do you suppose Billy was pleased and grateful to read your solution when I showed it to him triumphantly? Not the least in the world! That obstinate Goat only sniffed in a superior manner and would believe nothing of the sort. "You cannot convince me, Uncle Lisha," said he," regarding me with an aggravating air of concentrated wisdom, "that any simple disarrangement of the alphabet would account of Cousin—— here Billy sneezed violently three times, "mysterious name and address. My own opinion is very different, and although my researches are not yet completed, I have good grounds already for believing that Cousin—(more sneezes) is a member of the Doukhobor colony of Russians in Canada and that he has written to us from some such settlement in the north. This certainly seems much more reasonable than this childish solution of Cousin Alva's letter." And Billy sniffed again; triumphantly.

So there you are, Alva! When Billy won't he won't, and what's the use? We'll just have to let him worry and continue his "researches." You know the old proverb: "A Goat convinced against his Bill is of the same opinion still." That saying was just written about my co-worker, I believe. Billy never changes his mind; he hangs on to it.

Alva, if Bill decides that Cousin Bennie Gilbertson is a Doukhobor, why, as far as Billy is concerned, a Doukhobor he'll remain until he dies—and it may even end up by Bill's insisting that Bennie move north from Milnor, North Dakota into British Columbia.

SKELTON, R. R. 2, Spencer Lake, WASH.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I wish to introduce myself as a new niece and cousin. As I am from the state of Washington, I am a very clever clamdigger. This makes my second letter; Billy must have eaten my first one. If he did, I hope he had excruciating pains from indigestion. But I believe if you don't succeed at first, fire again!

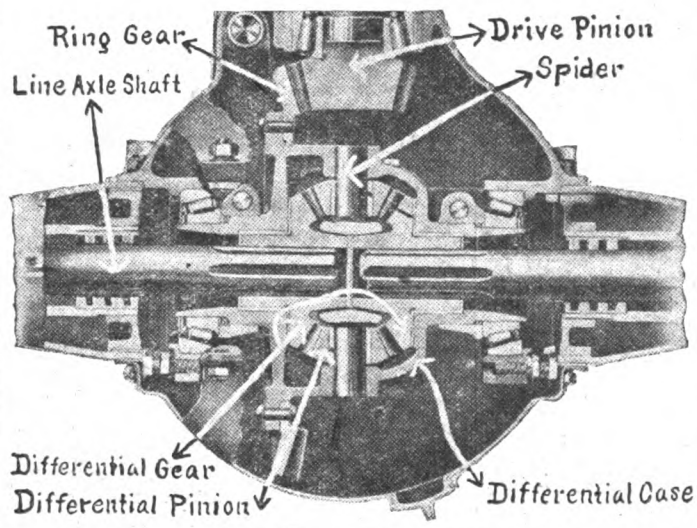
Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.



The Differential

HAVING received several inquiries of late regarding the action of the differential, I have decided to treat the matter in a brief article rather than to answer each inquiry separately. I do not wonder at people not understanding the principle as it is difficult to grasp from a writing. If any of the people who do not understand the principle will only inspect the cut-away models displayed at all auto shows, the matter will be made clear in a very few seconds. Seeing the assembly in operation is much different than reading an article and trying to figure out the operation from a few drawings most of which are Greek to the layman. In the rear axle case are two live axles which are joined together at the center by a differential. Each live axle shaft has a bevel gear on its inner end. The bevel gears are placed face to face (See cut).

Now note that these two bevel gears are connected by several smaller bevel gears. Some manufacturers use three and some four of these small gears which are called differential pinions. These differential gears are carried on one spider which in turn fits into the differential case and is driven with it. Fastened to the outside of the differential case is a large ring gear which in turn meshes with the driving pinion.

To get back to the principle of operation it will be noted that when the differential case revolves the differential pinions must revolve with it. When each rear wheel has the same traction as when running along on a straight road, the differential pinions apply the power or drive evenly to both larger bevel gears or differential gears as they should be rightfully termed.

However, consider a condition of turning a corner where the outside wheel must travel a greater distance than the inner wheel then it will be appreciated that both wheels do not have an equal driving power. This is accomplished by the differential pinions revolving on their axes.

Some of the inquiries indicate that a few of the readers have gained the idea that the pinions jump out of the mesh with the differential gears. The pinions are never out of mesh with the differential gears regardless whether the car is on a straightaway or turning a corner. The compensating action is done by the pinions revolving on their axes. That is how it is possible to jack a wheel free from the ground and have it spin while the other wheel remains stationary. In this case the pinions would revolve around the stationary differential gear and apply the drive to the jacked-up wheel.

Answers to Correspondents

MAGNETISM OF GENERATOR POLE PIECES.—Does the battery furnish current to magnetize the pole pieces of a generator? Will a generator generate current when it is not connected with the battery?

MRS. I. C., Delhi, Okla.

A.—You have opened up a subject upon which it is possible to go to great length. You will do well to purchase a book on electricity. There are several on the market. Regarding the battery furnishing current to magnetize the pole pieces of the generator, this condition can be brought about although it does not exist for ordinary operation. When the generator is at rest a cut-out, which is nothing more or less than a switch automatically operated, breaks the circuit and prevents the battery discharging back through the generator. However, should it be desired to energize the pole pieces it can be done by pressing the points of the cut-out together, which, as you will understand, completes the circuit and causes the current to flow from the battery to the generator.

Answering your second question regarding a generator producing current when the battery is disconnected, allow me to state that it will, and in all probability produce too much. Usually when the battery is removed it is recommended to render the generator nonproductive by removing a fuse, connecting a short-circuiting clip or by some other means. The danger lies in the generator producing too much current and burning up. It is a fact that when a current is caused to circulate around an iron core, the bore becomes magnetized. The core becomes more strongly magnetized as the strength of the current circulated increases. In this manner it is possible to produce powerful electromagnets, yet the instant that the current is stopped almost all of the magnetism disappears. You will note that I state "almost all." Now the point on which you seem to be in doubt is that the pole pieces do not lose all of their magnetism. There is just a little left which is known as residual magnetism. By the arrangement of the fields it is possible to build up this left-over magnetism, gradually increasing until enough is produced to charge the battery, etc. You will get the theory of how the generator builds up from books that incorporate diagrams, etc., much better than I could give you here in so limited space.

DIFFICULTY WITH STARTER.—My 1917 model Chevrolet does not start on self-starter. I have to turn the motor over with crank. What is the cause of the trouble? Also I would like to know how to mix acids for soldering copper and brass.

J. F. Jr., Girard, Kans.

A.—In all probability your starting trouble is due to a rundown storage battery. The drain on the battery for turning over the motor is so great that there is no current left for ignition. When you use the hand crank there is, of course, plenty current for ignition and you experience no difficulty in starting. Have the battery examined.

Muriatic acid cut with zinc is suitable for the soldering of copper and brass. Pour the acid into a cup or glass and drop in several strips of zinc.

CARBURETOR NEEDS ADJUSTMENT.—My 1918 model Ford misses when running 20 miles an hour or better, also when pulling in low speed with gas lever half an inch down, and when motor is running idle; but if pulling up a hill or through mud it will hit on all cylinders with gas lever down. Sometimes it runs at high speed without missing. Does it injure differential to jack up one rear wheel and use it for stationary work?

J. C., Kirksville, Mo.

A.—The description you have given would seem to indicate that your difficulty is due to an improperly adjusted carburetor. Try a trifle richer mixture. I would also suggest that you remove the timer cover and thoroughly clean the timer. If these suggestions do not help, turn the motor over slowly and feel the compression. It might be that one or more of the valves are leaking and need regrinding. There is also the likelihood of a leaky gasket which allows air to be suctioned slowly into the motor. This condition would cause a miss on idle or running slowly. I have assumed that you have determined that the spark-plugs are in good condition and the magneto strong.

Regarding the harnessing of one rear wheel for the operation of a machine, etc., there are several of these attachments on the market and a great many in use. I dislike very much to give an opinion on this matter but will state that it is very "hard" on the differential.

MISSES FIRE AND DIES DOWN.—My 1918 model Ford at times runs well for a while and then it will miss fire. I have to speed up when cold or it will die.

I have installed new carburetor, new valves and have had valves ground; have put in new rings and new vibrator points and cleaned out lead line. Seems at times as if it were losing compression, and at other times as if it might be weak mixture. What would you suggest? Also please give best method of installing new crank-shaft bearings. Can I scrape them satisfactorily myself? W. S. C., Wayne, Okla.

A.—After noting the steps you have already taken in an effort to improve operation it is my opinion that the carburetor needs adjusting a trifle richer. A lean mixture will cause motor to die when cold, also popping back through the carburetor. Regarding your belief that the motor lacks compression at times, you should be able to determine this by turning the motor over slowly with the hand crank. Are your gaskets drawn up tightly so there are no air leaks? Inspect the timer. Clean it if necessary or if it is worn out put another one on. To install new crank shaft, remove motor and take off lower half of case. You should be able to scrape in new shaft. Magnet charging article was run in recent issue.

COMPUTING HORSE POWER OF MOTORS.—I notice with regard to many motors particularly those of tractors, that the horse power is given as 10-20 or the like, and that those of automobiles as stated as 24 horse power or some other definite figure. Kindly explain the methods by which these ratings of horse power are computed.

A. O., Clifton, Tex.

A.—In computing the tax which an owner must pay on his automobile, the State must know the motor horse power. In order to arrive at a basis that will be fair to all concerned, the States have adopted the N. A. C. C. formula. This formula allows for a piston travel of 1,000 feet per minute and is as follows: Square of the cylinder bore in inches multiplied by the number of cylinders, the product of which is divided by the constant 2.5. A manufacturer may produce a motor having six cylinders and a bore of 3 3-16 inches. The State would tax the owner of this motor for 24 horse power. If you will figure by the N. A. C. C. formula you will find that the horse power is 24.3 but the States usually drop any fraction of a horse power and the tax would be on 24 horse power. Your difficulty probably is due to the fact that the state places a tax on 24 horse power and yet the manufacturer may be advertising this same motor at 50 to 55 horse power. The manufacturer arrives at his rating by subjecting the motor to tests. Due to design and construction this motor may develop very high horse power and when the manufacturer states 50 to 55 horse power he is giving you the horse power which the motor will actually develop. However, as stated before, in an effort to be fair to all, the N. A. C. C. formula has been adopted and thereby you have the explanation for the variance in horse power ratings.

HOW VACUUM FUEL LIFT WORKS.—Please explain fully the operation of a vacuum fuel feed lift on a gasolene engine. W. C. H., Colquit, Ga.

A.—The vacuum system consists of a main storage tank usually suspended at the rear of the chassis, a small tank under the motor hood into which gasolene is transferred from the main tank from where it flows to the carburetor by gravity. The small vacuum tank is divided into an upper and lower chamber. The upper chamber connects with the intake manifold and is also piped to the main storage tank in the rear of the car. The lower chamber of the tank is connected by pipe to the carburetor. As you possibly know, the intake strokes of the pistons in the cylinders create suction or vacuum. These suction strokes are made use of for the lifting of the gasolene out of the main storage tank into the small vacuum tank. The action is as follows: the intake strokes in the motor create a vacuum in the upper chamber of the vacuum tank which draws gasolene out of the storage tank. As the gasolene flows into the upper chamber it raises a float valve until it reaches a height that shuts off the vacuum or suction from the motor and also opens a valve which places the chamber at atmospheric pressure. The atmospheric pressure allows the gasolene to flow from the upper into the lower chamber of the tank. The draining of the gasolene out of the upper tank causes the float valve to lower, shut off the atmospheric pressure and open the vacuum valve. The process of filling the upper chamber goes on as above explained and the operation of filling and emptying the upper chamber is automatic and continuous. The lower chamber of the tank is always at atmospheric pressure and the gasolene in this chamber is free to flow to the carburetor by gravity as required.

One pound of cottonseed meal per day for each 1,000 pounds live weight is the most satisfactory quantity to feed work animals, according to recent experiments conducted by the United States Department of Agriculture. A test in feeding cottonseed meal to work horses and mules at the Government farm, Beltsville, Md., was begun in 1918 and continued last year. When the meal was fed in large quantities harmful effects were apparent, however, indicating that cottonseed meal, like any other high-protein feed, must be fed with care to horses and mules.

Gardening in June

JUNE for all of us is the ideal play month of the year, "for then if ever come perfect days," with birds innumerable singing overhead among the boughs richly bedecked in their new spring grandeur of vivid green. But there are so many things to be done about the farm and in the garden that little time remains for play—unless, like many of us, you consider your garden work as play and enjoy every minute spent there with hoe or cultivator or sprinkling can.

Only a very little planting remains to be done in June. Plant sweet corn and bush beans twice during the month, and if the "kiddies" like popcorn (we have yet to find little ones that don't) plant it now, using tested seed of some well-known variety. Plant beets for winter use, and set out pumpkins and squash either in beds of their own or in the corn hills. Don't forget to plant a row of Essex rape for the poultry, and while you are at it set some extra cabbages to be hung in the henhouse in winter. Perhaps there is an old, wornout strawberry bed; if so, plow it up and plant the cabbage there. And while you have the spade handy, why not fix up a flower bed or two? A few rapid-growing annuals around the kitchen door and beside the front porch will gladden up the whole place—and brighten up the face of the "missus." Thre are any number of flowers to choose from: zinnias, marigolds, asters, verbenas, nasturtiums, cosmos and portulaca. Even dahlias may still be set out, but remember to set the tubers on their sides with the eyes up.

Controlling Garden Pests

With the possible exception of weeding and hoeing, the fight against insect pests of every imaginable kind and description in the garden is perhaps the most important June job. Unless the fight is waged vigorously and consistently the pests will be sure to "get in their work" and the garden will plainly show the evidence of neglect. If the gardener is ever on the lookout for pests, and immediately carries out a few simple control measures before they get "out of hand," their ravages can be well controlled. It is time and money wasted, for instance, to apply Paris green to potato vines after the leaves have been eaten off by potato beetles.

Spray materials of some sort will control the vast majority of insect pests. First determine what the pest is, then spray with the insecticide intended especially for it. This sounds simple—and it is, for the experienced gardener. But for the beginner there is much to learn by close observation, for some insects are "suckers" that cannot be poisoned, and some are "eaters" that can be poisoned. For the suckers, therefore, a contact insecticide that kills by coming in contact with tender skin must be used.

If insects eat the foliage of growing plants, they may be controlled by using poisons such as arsenate of lead, Paris green or hellebore. The last named poison is especially useful in controlling the pests that cause such havoc upon the foliage of roses. On the other hand, for sucking insects that live on the juices of plants, ordinary poisons are useless. To kill them use nicotine sulphate or kerosene emulsion. Among insects of this class are several kinds and colors of plant lice or aphis. Look for them on the under sides of tender leaves and toward the ends of new shoots where they form dense masses or clusters that are easily discovered.

Dodder Is Serious Pest

If early steps are taken to control dodder, a parasitic plant infecting clover and alfalfa, this pest may be prevented from doing serious damage, but if permitted to spread and develop unmolested its eradication becomes a difficult matter.

During the first season of infestation, dodder usually occurs in small, scattered areas or patches in the clover or alfalfa field. As is the case with all noxious weeds, dodder should be prevented from maturing seed. This is best accomplished by mowing with a scythe all patches noticed in the field, then piling the cut plants in the spot where they grew, allowing them to dry. When thoroughly dry, burn them carefully, turning over occasionally to see that burning is complete. In this way not only the plants and immature seed but ripened seed which may have fallen upon the ground, is completely destroyed.

If infestation is so general that patch treatment cannot be depended upon, it will be necessary to cut clover or alfalfa early, before seed has had time to form. When this is done it is well to graze the stubble closely, sheep being best for this purpose. Many farmers make it a practice to plow under early in the growing season all fields in which dodder has become well established, then plant to crops other legumes for several seasons.

Preventing introduction on the farm is an easier matter than eradicating dodder once it has gained a firm foothold. It is generally introduced in impure or dirty clover or alfalfa seed, where it may be seen with a hand lens as dull-coated, roughened, minutely-pitted seeds varying considerably in size. Perhaps the easiest point of identification is that dodder has two or three flattened surfaces, whereas clover seed is usually smooth, rounded and shiny.

When animals are allowed to graze where dodder grows, they should not have access to fields not infested, since they are likely to spread the weed by means of stems clinging to their bodies. On land which has become badly infested, and where seeds are known to be present in the soil, it is best to practice a five-year rotation, using corn, potatoes, and small grains such as wheat, oats, barley or rye until all seed in the soil has germinated and died for lack of its clover or alfalfa hosts. Other crops such as some of the grasses or hay crops may be used in the rotation, but sugar beets, onions, flax, and to a lesser extent certain other crops, are subject to dodder infestation so should be avoided.

Sudan Grass Becoming Popular

Introduced into the United States only ten years ago from North Africa, Sudan grass is rapidly gaining general and well-earned popularity as a catch crop which can be planted when other hay crops have failed. For this purpose it is rapidly replacing millet because it produces good yields of hay of high quality even under conditions of low rainfall, has a rather short growing season, and is able to thrive on a wide range of soil types. It is not suited to poorly drained, cold land, but on good soil yields heavily. In California under irrigation, it has made yields of more than nine tons of field cured hay per acre, where alfalfa made only a fraction over eight tons. On an average the yields run about equal to alfalfa, but the total yield is made in three cuttings under irrigated conditions as compared to five cuttings for alfalfa. Even in the dry regions of the Southwest, grown without irrigation, Sudan grass makes from one to three tons to the acre.

Although Sudan grass is adapted by nature to use as a hay crop, it is also used with success as a soiling and pasture crop. Its use as a soiling crop is limited by the fact that it is easily made into hay and fed as such with very little waste, and also because corn and sorghum both outyield it and are grown generally throughout the same regions.

In semi-arid districts highest yields are made when the grass is sown in rows that permit cultivation, but the advantage in yield is offset by the increased labor necessary. For ordinary farm purposes drilling in or broadcasting gives satisfactory results, a common grain drill handling well-cleaned seed without trouble. Grown in this manner the hay is finer stemmed and matures more evenly than if grown in rows.

Sudan grass is about equal in feeding value to timothy hay. In localities where soybeans or cowpeas do well these legumes may be grown along with the grass, such a mixture producing hay of higher feeding value than the grass alone because of the increased protein content of the legumes.

In regions where both Sudan grass and any of the common varieties of sorghums are grown, the former hybridizes freely with the latter. It is therefore necessary that they be grown far enough apart to prevent crossing, otherwise the result will be a mongrel crop that is neither Sudan grass nor sorghum, and that lacks the desirable qualities of either.

Soybean Silage and Hay

Six out of seven State experiment stations reporting on the feeding of soybean and corn silage combined, as compared to corn silage alone, consider the combination silage either superior to the corn silage or state that the former requires less grain as a supplement. When soybeans and corn are grown separately, then mixed as they go into the silo, it has been found that when the two are combined in the proportion of two loads of corn for each load of soybeans best results are obtained.

Soybean hay contains about 10 per cent. more digestible protein than alfalfa hay, but in other respects they are similar in composition. Feeding trials with soybean hay show it to be about equal in all respects to alfalfa and superior to red clover for milk production when fed to dairy cows. In certain other respects soybeans have an advantage over alfalfa, however. In the first place, alfalfa is mainly grown for hay, though to a lesser extent as green feed for sheep and hogs, while soybeans can be fed as hay, silage, ground beans, meal or fed whole. Moreover, soybeans are adapted to soil conditions not suited to alfalfa, and a crop planted in the spring is harvested the same season, while alfalfa does not yield a crop until the second and subsequent seasons. Soybeans therefore have several points in their favor that recommend them highly for more general farm use.

Most Hawks and Owls are Helpful

"Don't kill hawks and owls indiscriminately," says a report of the U. S. Biological Survey. Only a very few are thieves, though the common but mistaken idea is to the contrary. A very large majority of both hawks and owls are beneficial to the farmer, living mainly upon insects and small rodents. In a sense it is a case of the twenty-four hour day, the hawks taking the day shift and the owls working at night.

Examinations made of the stomachs of hundreds of hawks and owls proved conclusively that both are valuable aids to the farmer in the war against injurious insects and other vermin. One Swainson's hawk was found to have 100 grasshoppers in its stomach, this number representing a single meal. Near a barn owl's nest 3,000 skulls were found, 97 per cent. of which consisted of field mice, house mice, common rats and wood mice. And still the barn owl is shot on sight by most farmers! In another case almost a bushel of the remains of pocket gophers was found near a barn owl's nest, showing how active these birds are in destroying these pests. Keep these facts in mind next time a hawk or owl is seen hovering around the farmyard. Perhaps it is intent on the mice and rats that abound in the straw stack or granary, and really has no serious intention of raiding the poultry yard, after all. Don't shoot until you are sure of the culprit.

Get Rid of the Roosters

A recent bulletin issued by the Missouri Experiment Station points out the large annual loss from bad eggs, and explains that even one rooster left at large on the farm during the summer months may cause most of the eggs from a large flock to be fertilized—and fertile eggs simply cannot remain sweet and wholesome for food purposes during hot weather. Even one or two days of summer temperature will result in sufficient development to give eggs a decidedly strong taste, and a week of heat will often make them totally unfit for food.

There is small excuse for keeping old roosters on the farm during the summer, and no excuse whatever for allowing them to run at large with the hens to eat feed that might better be fed to laying hens or growing chickens. When especially valuable males are kept for breeding purposes, see that they are not allowed to run with the flock. A small coop or pen will suffice for this purpose provided there is ample shade, room for exercise, and a liberal allowance of feed and water. Handled in this way, they will be better breeders in the early spring when again allowed with the flock.

Separate young cockerels from the farm flock as soon as they begin to crow, in this way preventing them from annoying the hens, and assuring rapid growth and satisfactory development. On farms where colony houses are in use a satisfactory method of handling is to move all the young cockerels to the cornfield in early fall. Here they will be far enough away from other fowls to prevent annoyance, and the satisfactory rate of growth will amply reward the precaution.

Salt for Cattle on Pasture

Most farmers know that cattle on pasture need and use more salt than during the period of the year when they are being fed in the barn. An extensive experiment recently completed by the Kansas State Agricultural College brings out some interesting facts along this line.

It was found that cattle in pasture consumed on an average about 2.83 pounds of salt per head in July; 1.80 pounds in August; 1.17 pounds in September; and 1.20 pounds in October. In every instance late June or early July were the periods of greatest salt consumption, followed by a steady decrease until October when fall rains brought on a stimulation of grass growth accompanied by a demand for more salt.

Owing to waste and weathering about twice the amount of salt actually consumed by stock must be supplied if their needs are to be adequately met. Cattle showed a preference for granulated rock salt and blocks of evaporated rock salt to the harder blocks produced under pressure.

Lambs Need Sunshine

"Give young lambs plenty of exercise, plenty of sunshine, and plenty of good feed, and they will grow rapidly and be healthy, strong and thrifty," states a report of the Iowa State College. To get good big lambs, keep them growing rapidly and allow them all the milk they can get from the ewes. To stimulate milk flow of ewes, feed them a ration high in protein and provide ample pasture. Avoid old, bare-bitten pastures where intestinal parasites are sure to be found. Lambs will begin to eat when they are two to three weeks old. Encourage them to do so by placing a creep within their reach. The creep will exclude the ewes but will allow the lambs free access to good clover or alfalfa hay and a grain mixture consisting of two pounds of wheat bran, one pound of ground oats, one pound of finely-ground cornmeal and one-half pound of oilmeal.

What Is the Best Fertilizer?

Clover and cows are the best fertilizers, according to Griffith Richards, of the Wisconsin Experiment Station. A cow will return 80 per cent. of her feed to the soil even when all her milk is sold off the farm. Clover will do even better, for it takes nitrogen from the air and makes it into easily available plant food. Commercial fertilizers have their place, especially in regions where little livestock is kept and where clover does not thrive, but even at a greatly reduced price they will never take the place now occupied by clover and good barnyard manure in building up soil fertility, according to Mr. Richards. Commercial fertilizers should be used not as a "cure-all" but simply as an addition to legumes and manure, for best and cheapest results.

Lanterns as Moth Traps

Lanterns have been successfully used in sugar-beet fields of Colorado and Idaho for the purpose of trapping the moths of the beet webworm. In one instance reported, after three lanterns had been allowed to burn for a single night, 422 dead moths were found the following morning. Large lanterns made to burn crude oil, and equipped with a pan into which the moths fall, are now coming into use. Is it not possible that this same plan might well be employed by readers whose orchards or gardens have suffered from the depredations of any number of the worm pests that are but the larvæ of night flying moths?

Hens Need Much Water

Many farmers and even some poultrymen fail to recognize the importance of providing the farm flock with an ample supply of fresh water at all times. Unless hens are given all the milk they care for, water should always be within their reach, and even when milk is fed water should also be available. It is well to keep in mind the fact that a dozen eggs contain about a pint of water—and that hens cannot lay "dried eggs." Another point that should be observed as regards water for poultry is that laying hens should have fresh water to drink just as soon as they come off the roosts in the early morning, and again the last thing before going to roost at night. If water is not supplied at these two times, the best of feeding may fail to produce satisfactory results.

A Creep for Young Pigs

Creeps that exclude the sows but that permit young pigs to reach a supply of tempting feed are a valuable aid in hog raising and should be more generally used by hog raisers, according to recent statement issued by the Iowa Agricultural College. A bulletin called "Handy Swine Equipment," giving specifications and costs of materials, will be mailed free to readers upon request.

By allowing little pigs to eat by themselves they soon learn to eat grains, thus relieving the demand made for food upon the sows. Pigs that learn to eat early, and that are supplied a grain mixture, succulence, and good pasture, make faster gains, better growth, are healthier and stronger, and can be fitted for market earlier and more cheaply. Moreover, those that learn to eat young are not subject to a setback at weaning time, a common occurrence if they are forced to depend for food entirely upon the sow.

By means of simple gateways in the pens a passageway that will admit the smaller pigs but will keep out the sows can be constructed simply and cheaply. Creep gates can be placed in all pen fences that can be closed or left open at will for only a small expense. Another plan commonly used is to construct a movable crib with slats spaced widely enough to allow little pigs to go between them, but too close for larger pigs to gain entrance. Inside the crib troughs or self-feeders containing grain mixtures are placed and kept filled for the exclusive use of the small pigs.

Questions and Answers

YELLOW SWEET CLOVER.—I have heard that yellow sweet clover is better than the white variety, but I have never seen it grown to make sure for myself. Is this true? How is it grown? Will it grow here? Is it better than red clover? J. M. C., Minn.

A.—There is no question but that yellow sweet clover will thrive in your part of Minnesota just as well as white sweet clover, provided, of course, that the land is inoculated. The white variety is generally regarded as superior to the yellow, as it makes a larger crop, stands up straighter and seems to get started earlier in the season. Either the white or the yellow will yield somewhat more than medium red clover, but it is doubtful whether the hay is of equal value, since curing is more difficult. Both varieties are inclined to grow heavy and woody in the stalk and the leaves shatter off easily in curing unless handled with the greatest of care. For these reasons it would hardly be advisable for you to grow it instead of red clover if that crop does well in your locality.

MINERALIZED WATER ROUTS CHICKEN LICE

Tablets Dropped into Drinking Founts Banish Vermin, Make Fowls Grow Faster and Increase Egg Yield.

Any poultry raiser can easily rid his flock of lice and mites, makes chickens grow faster and increase their egg yield by simply adding minerals to the fowls' drinking water. This does away with all bother, such as dusting, greasing, dipping and spraying. The necessary minerals can now be obtained in convenient tablets, known as Paratabs. Soon after the fowls drink the mineralized water, all lice and mites leave them. The tablets also act as a tonic conditioner. The health of the fowls quickly improves, they grow faster and the egg yield frequently is doubled. Little chicks that drink freely of the water never will be bothered by mites or lice.

The method is especially recommended for raisers of purebred stock, as there is no risk of soiling the plumage. The tablets are warranted to impart no flavor or odor to the eggs and meat. This remarkable conditioner, egg tonic and lice remedy costs only a trifle and is sold under an absolute guarantee. The tablets are scientifically prepared, perfectly safe, and dissolve readily in water.

Any reader of this paper may try them without risk. The laboratories producing Paratabs are so confident of good results that to introduce them to every poultry raiser they offer two big $1 packages for only $1. Send no money, just your name and address—a card will do— to the Paratab Laboratories, Dept. 869, 1100 Coca Cola Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., and the two $1 packages, enough for 100 gallons of water, will be mailed. Pay the postman $1 and postage on delivery, and if you are not delighted with results in 10 days—if your chickens are not healthier, laying more eggs and entirely free from lice and mites—your money will be promptly refunded. Don't hesitate to accept this trial offer as you are fully protected by this guarantee.

A New Breed Specially for Our Northern States

A NEW breed, or even a new variety of an old established breed, is always of interest to poultry growers, for we all live in hope of having something better than we now have, though when one thinks of the immense strides which have been made in poultry breeding during the last twenty years, it seems as if we ought to be satisfied. But human nature is so covetous that the more we have the more we want. Twenty years ago, specially good hens laid 150 eggs a year; ten years ago a 200-egg hen was looked upon as a wonder. Today, the 300-egg hen is no longer a rarity. In fact, during 1919 and 1920, trap-nest records prove that one poultry plant had twenty-four hens who laid 300 eggs in 365 consecutive days, and the following year the same plant had thirty-two hens that passed the 300 egg mark. Three of them were in the official egg contest of Weston, Washington, held at Puyallup, all of which proves that we have really got reason to hope that the phenomenal has become the average. Every new breed or variety of breed for the last decade has been created with special regard for the development of egg production as much or more than for beauty, so we all look with interest and expectation to a new breed, hoping that it will prove to be a practical realization of our insatiable desire for more eggs. The latest creation certainly will go far toward improving the productiveness of flocks in the Northwest and Canada, for which part of the country they have been especially developed by Mr. F. M. Wilfrid, poultry expert at the agricultural school at La Trappe, P. Q., Canada, who has for years been under the impression that Canada and the cold Northern States should have a breed of hens that could withstand the severe winters, and after fifteen years of painstaking, patient perseverance his chanticleer was admitted to the Standard of Perfection by the A. P. A. convention held at Seattle, last August.

The Chantecler was added to the American class, as it originated in Canada and is of the same general type as other American breeds. Its friends, however, believe that it combines in an unusual degree the practical qualities that are sought in all general-purpose fowls, such as large size, excellent table qualities, productiveness, etc. One special advantage which fowls of this variety are believed to possess is the extra small size of comb and wattles which make these appendages practically frost proof—a truly important advantage in the severe climate of Canada, and desirable throughout the northern part of the United States generally.

In speaking of his work, Mr. Wilfrid says: "Knowing by experience how the combs of our birds were the cause of such severe losses during winter, I was determined to reduce the comb to the minimum and the wattles in proportion. As for plumage, I consider white the best color to adopt. Furthermore, I wanted to produce a general-purpose bird, a good winter layer, and at the same time, a bird capable of putting on flesh when consigned to the fattening pen. To me, such a bird was far more advantageous than our smaller breeds possessing only the laying capacity, or our large breeds which to a great extent are only useful for fattening."

The first steps in the development of the Chantecler were taken in 1908, and since that time Mr. Wilfrid has faithfully pursued his ideal and appears to have brought it to a high degree of perfection, even as far back as 1918, for before introducing the Chantecler to the public, provisory rules were enacted, amongst which was the obligation of a general show to which all breeders had to bring all the birds they had raised in order to make a judicious and severe selection. The show was held in Montreal in January, 1918, and turned to a percentage of 82 per cent. of typical birds.

Then came the idea of a regular association. Over fifty members were immediately inscribed, and in March, 1918, the association had doubled in number. The association accounts now over three hundred members.

The titulars of the association are the following:

Honorary President: Hon. J. Ed Caron, Minister of Agriculture, Quebec.

Honorary Vice President: Rev. Bro. Liguori, Chief of the Poultry Service, Quebec.

Active President: A. A. Lapointe, Esq., President of the Montreal Poultry Association.

Vice President, Alb Heroux, Esq., B. S. A., Professor, Agricultural Institute of Oka.

Directors: Raoul Dumaine, Assistant Poultry Husbandman at Central Experimental Farm, Ottawa; Dr. Sylvio Lafortune, President Quebec Provincial Poultry Association, Point Gatineau, Quebec; C. Toupin, Inspector of Cheese Factories, Quebec, St. Isadore, Laprairie; L. A. Lapointe, M. P., St. Jacques, Montreal; J. L. Bonneville, St. Remee, Que.

Secretary Treasurer: Gust Toupin, B. S. A., Agricultural Institute of Oka.

Assistant Secretary Treasurer: Gregoire Matte, B. S. A., La Trappe, Que.

Technical Adviser: Rev. Bro. Wilfrid, of the Institute, and originator of the Chantecler.

With such men as this endorsing the new breed there can be no doubt about its practical value.

In the initial matings two crosses were used. In one a Dark Cornish male was employed to get general conformation, vigor, and small comb and wattles. With this male was mated a White Leghorn, thus to secure productiveness. A second mating consisted of a Rhode Island cock and a White Wyandotte. It will be noted that the hens in both cases were white, this selection being based on Wilfrid's belief that the female gives the color and the male the shape. The first mating gave a bird of a grayish color with feathers very short, closely set to the body, and slender shape, while the "head showed neither comb nor wattles." In the Rhode Island Red and Wyandotte cross, white predominated, with a splashing of gray and black. Among these birds appeared a bird which was almost a typical Columbian Wyandotte. The next year all the whitest pullets of the Cornish Leghorn cross were mated with this Columbian Wyandotte male, from which cross birds in a variety of colors were secured, some of them resembling Leghorns or Rhode Island Reds in character, but in most the Cornish type predominated.

With reference to subsequent matings, Mr. Wilfrid says: "Perseverance being the mother of success, I continued my undertaking, each year making a judicious selection of my birds, retaining only those of desired form and good laying records. After following this course for three years, I began to find a remarkable change in my flock; the color was almost uniform, the laying capacity had increased considerably, the comb and wattles were disappearing, and the birds had proved to be very vigorous and active.

"Taking advantage of the good results of 1913, I decided to make two different flocks. With one of these flocks I practiced inbreeding to a certain extent, whilst I introduced new blood into the other, in the shape of a fine Wyandotte cock, from which I obtained a fine lot of graceful birds. In 1916 my flock was so uniform, the egg yield so remarkable, that I considered I had almost struck my mark."

By 1916 the breed was considered fairly well developed, except that the desired size had so far not been secured. In that year, however, a pullet turned up that at the age of seven months weighed seven and three-quarters pounds, and proved to be an excellent winter layer, producing 91 eggs in the four months of November, December, January and February. This pullet was mated with a White Plymouth Rock cock and all the best cockerels were used on the older strain, adding to it the desired character of greater size, also better productiveness.

Mr. Wilfrid concludes his account of the development of the breed with this statement: "In short, the 'Chantecler,' embracing as she does the five best breeds of poultry in this country and bearing all their aptitudes, though exceling them in activity and hardiness, the direct results of having been bred in her own country, can now make her way in the rank and file, and prove her superiority in the poultry world."

The Standard for the Chantecler, as fixed by Mr. Wilfrid and the Canadian Chantecler Breeders' Association, is as follows:

GENERAL CHARACTERS.

MALE.

Head—Short, large skull, indicating a strong constitution.
Beak—Stout, slightly curved.
Eyes—Medium size, almost round, with a bright expression.
Comb—Cushion shaped, rather small, set firm on the fore part of the head; the front and rear square and not with any point; even surface, smooth, and not covered with small, round points.
Wattles and Ear-Lobes—Rather small, of a smooth texture. Ear-lobes oval shape, wattle almost round.
Neck—Medium length, slightly arched, becoming smaller near the head; hackle abounding, flowing well over shoulders, with no apparent break of cape.
Wings—Well folded, the points of flights well covered with saddle feathers.
Back—Long, broad in its entire length; slightly curving at bottom of tail. Saddle feathers abundant.
Tail—Of medium length, carried at an angle of 45 degrees above the horizontal. Sickles of medium length, slightly extending beyond the main tail feathers which can be seen through.
Breast—Large, deep, well rounded, prominent.
Fluff—Short and full.
Body—Long, large. (Feathers closely set to body.)
Legs and Toes—Thighs of medium length, large, well covered with soft feathers. Toes straight, four in number for each leg.

HEN.

Head—Short, small, with large skull, same as rooster.
Beak—Stout, strong, slightly curved.
Eyes—Medium size, almost round.
Comb—Cushion shaped, very small, smooth and not covered with small, rounded points, square at front and rear.
Wattles and Ear-Lobes—Very small, scarcely perceptible.
Neck—Medium length, arched, becoming smaller near the head.
Wings—Well folded and of medium length.
Back—Long, broad at shoulders, slightly sloping near the saddle and slightly curving near the tail.
Tail—Medium length, carried at an angle of 45 degrees above the horizontal.
Breast—Large, full, well rounded, prominent.
Body—Long, large. (Feathers closely set to body.)
Fluff—Short and full.
Legs and Toes—Thighs of medium length, well covered with soft feathers, shanks of medium length, far and well set apart. Toes, straight, of medium length.

COLOR IN BOTH SEXES.

Beak—Yellow.
Eyes—Reddish bay.
Comb, Face, Wattles and Ear-Lobes—Bright red.
Plumage—Snow white.
Shanks—Yellow.

DISQUALIFICATIONS.

Specimens having any of the following defects are subject to disqualification:

White in ear-lobes; one or more feathers foreign to the breed; comb that is not cushion shaped; legs any other color than yellow; one or more feathers or unmistakable indication of feathers on shanks and toes; wry tail and any other deformity inherent to other breeds.

STANDARD WEIGHTS.

Cock	9	pounds
Cockerel	8	pounds
Hen	7	pounds
Pullet	6½	pounds

The Month's Work in Your Own Flock

This is the time of year when yarded fowls need the very best of care, for they must have, as nearly as possible, all they would naturally seek if running at large. This includes, besides the grain we feed by formula, green food, meat, a scratching place and dusting spot, and grit and water. Of all these, I consider green food the most necessary, and the one thing to be impressed upon the mind, because it is the one thing too often forgotten. The ideal yarding of fowls is what is known as double yarding—a house in the middle and a yard on each side. These yards can be sown with rye or oats, and alternated so that the fowls will have a constant green run as long as the rye or oats will grow, which is until frost. Failing the double-yard system, green food may be supplied by lawn clippings, whole cabbage, mangel wurzels, turnips, or any vegetable.

Meat can be fed in a variety of ways. Turning up the ground of the yards with a cultivator, or by shallow plowing, will bring the worms and bugs within reach, or sheeps' heads cut open and fed raw can be thrown in, and this is an ideal meat feed. Ground beef scraps softened may be mixed in mash—and last, and probably the best, cut green bone.

Yarded fowls need exercise. It must not be understood that because they are confined they do not get exercise, or as much as if let run at large. The yards should be at least one hundred and fifty feet long, if they are the width of the average coop, which is ten to twelve feet. Some breeds are decidedly more active by nature than others; for instance, the Leghorns as compared with the Cochins or Brahmas. This does not affect the health of the fowls particularly. A Leghorn is no healthier because of her activity than a Cochin is. It is simply the difference in their natures, but because of this excess of activity of one breed over another, the one must have more room than the other. The Leghorn stands the confinement of a small coop ten by twelve feet in winter, provided she can be kept actively hunting for her food; but the same bird would mope and become out of condition if confined too long in an exhibition coop in a showroom. On the other hand, a Cochin, being of a lazier nature, forages slowly, and wanders slowly over her yard, takes things easy in the winter coop, and stands the confinement of the winter coop excellently.

The foraging nature of any breed can be killed by excessive feeding. Even birds with free range, if overfed at special meal hours, will take but limited exercise, exactly as those treated the same way and yarded. Exercise is induced by short feeding. In other words, no laying strain should be fed all they can eat except at night. Hunger induces exercise, whether a fowl be let run or yarded. Therefore, fowls fed short and induced to hunt for more, will lay eggs, while those overfed, in the morning specially, will sit around moping in the sun, and convert the food into flesh instead of eggs.

Another advantage of yarding fowls is the certainty of finding all the eggs laid every day, and then being able to guarantee them as strictly fresh. This is a point of great importance, and constitutes the difference between eggs produced by an up-to-date breeder with yarded fowls and those sold by the "honest farmer" who collects them every day, and cannot swear that they were laid today—not two weeks ago.

It is strange that few people except the real poultry farmers realize that July is one of the most important months of the year. The desire to have eggs in zero weather invariably compels good attention to hens during the winter. Baby chicks arouse interest in the spring, but as the weather gets warmer, eggs are plentiful, and the pretty, fluffy babies have developed into long, lanky creatures, who seem nothing but a nuisance specially ordained to destroy the garden, so the poor things are shut up in small quarters and woefully neglected. During the fall and winter I am repeatdly asked how to make pullets and hens lay, but I can rarely suggest a remedy, because nine times out of ten it is the result of blunders made the preceding summer.

If poultry is to be kept profitable, the old and young stock must have been kept apart, because it is impossible to feed correctly when they are all together. Young birds need plenty of nutritious food to push them along quickly, and laying hens must be put on special rations to bring about early moulting, which is the foundation of a good winter supply of eggs.

Moulting

About July 5th commence to cut down the feed gradually, until at the end of two weeks forty hens are having a pint of oats and a pint of wheat mixed, night and morning. Scatter it amongst cut straw or some litter, so they will have to scratch for every grain. The first of August commence to increase the rations, and keep it up for a week, so that by the fifteenth they are getting two quarts of mash in the morning, a quart of meat scraps and a pint of cracked corn at noon, and wheat and oats or barley at night. Give them just about what they will eat up clean in fifteen minutes. The morning mash should be composed of two parts ground feed (corn and oats), one part white middlings and one part oilmeal, mixed with scalding milk or water. The semi-starvation followed by the heavy feed forces the moulting season and allows plenty of time to feather out and get into condition before October, when their rations should be made up of the essentials for egg production, which are clover, hay, bran, wheat, corn and animal food.

You see, it takes about three months for hens

Set Your Own Egg Prices!

You yourself can govern next winter's egg prices now.

How? Simply by storing eggs away in RUTLAND Egg Preserver while egg prices are reasonable. In winter you'll have all the eggs you want at those reasonable prices.

A pint of RUTLAND will preserve 8 dozen fresh eggs. A quart will save 18 to 20 dozen. Prepare the fall solution and put away only a few eggs first if you wish and add more from time to time. The more eggs you store now, the more money you will save. They keep fresh in RUTLAND Egg Preserver from 9 months to a year.

The government highly recommends saving eggs in water glass. Using the genuine RUTLAND, instead of taking chances with unknown egg preservers, insures complete satisfaction.

RUTLAND Egg Preserver, in pint, quart and gallon sizes, comes in air-tight tins that keep its strength. Look for the red and green check on the RUTLAND can at any poultry supply house, general store or drug store. If you can't get RUTLAND Egg Preserver send us your dealer's name and you will be supplied promptly.

French Ivory Manicure Set
In A Roll-Up Leather Case

Given For A Club Of Four!

A PRACTICAL and beautiful Set, containing everything necessary for the proper care of the nails. It consists of a 5-inch flexible polished steel nail file, a pair of 3½-inch polished steel curved nail scissors, a 4-inch cuticle knife with French Ivory handle, a 4-inch French Ivory nail stick, and a 4½-inch nail polisher or buffer with French Ivory Top. All these articles are neatly contained in a moire-lined, genuine leather case, measuring 5½ inches wide and 6 inches from end to end when opened. The case rolls up as shown in illustration, and fastens with two snap clasps. In this form it resembles a miniature pocketbook, and is just as convenient to carry, as it measures only 5½x2 inches and only 1 inch in thickness.

Although we offer this Manicure Set for an unusually small club, please understand that each and every piece is strictly high grade and regulation size. We know that every woman and girl who accepts this offer and earns one of these splendid Sets will be more than delighted with it. It is free on the terms of the following offer.

Given To You! For four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this splendid French Ivory Manicure Set in a roll-up leather case free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8124.

IT was suggested a few months ago that we exchange our pet faults with each other and tell how we overcame them. I told you a few of mine at the time (only I haven't overcome them yet) and then sat back patiently and waited for letters. When I had about concluded that all my girls were without fault, a letter came from a dear little girl in Alabama (who said she had the best Daddy on earth), admitting that one of her faults was a form of bashfulness, that of meeting people one day and speaking to them and the next day going right by them without speaking. This is a small fault but one that causes many hurts and misunderstandings, so now she meets everyone she knows with a smile and pleasant word. She has made herself do this.

Two other girls frankly admitted that they were jealous and two-faced. That's being honest. If these faults have been overcome by any of the others it would be a kindness to tell us how you did it. Whose next?

IN LOVE, Montana.—Just because you feel "so queer" is no sign that you are in love. It might be indigestion. I feel that way after eating mince pie. However, there seems to be no reason why someone shouldn't fall in love with you, so don't worry. Worry is fatal to beauty and blondes fade early. As to the man in question, the one you met St. Patrick's Day, in case you have not forgotten about him by this time—if he wants to know you better he will, and to "draw his attention," as you suggest, might make him regard you less favorably. Just be natural and if it doesn't "take," console yourself with the thought that there are plenty of eligible men in Montana. I've heard so, anyway, and have often thought seriously of going out there. But I'll stay home and give you my chance.

SUNSHINE, Indiana.—When he apologized and you accepted his apology the matter should have been automatically settled, and your former friendliness resumed. You aren't showing a generous spirit when you refuse to speak to him. Why not tell him you are sorry you said such unkind things to him? Then you could start in all over again and be the best of friends?

BROKEN-HEARTED BILLY, Montana.—You had better forget all about him and let the other girl have him, though she never did anything to me. You wouldn't want a husband that would leave you every time another woman asked him, would you? He's a weak cup of tea.

LONESOME MOLLIE, Tennessee.—How do you get that way, Mollie? "So lonely.....life miserable without a charming husband." In the first place, no girl of twenty-two, in your circumstances, should be lonely, and, secondly, all husbands are not charming, at least, to their own wives, and a husbandless life needn't necessarily be a wasted life. If you are going to normal school simply in hopes of meeting your "loving man" there, you won't be much of a success as a teacher. I have the greatest respect for teachers, old maid teachers if you will, for their influence has been of the greatest worth to boys and girls under their care. That's one way of "disposing" of your life, as you say, though it sounds suicidal. I'm not scolding for I admire you for your desire for a home and children of your own and, of course, a husband. Perhaps it would be better to continue your school work and let the search for a husband wait a few years. In the meantime he may find you. Men have always been explorers and dislike to be found—or found out—and prefer to do their finding themselves. We are taking most of their privileges from them so let's leave them that one.

LILLIE, N. C.—If he loves you too much to give you up then he should love you enough to ask you to marry him and give up all other girls for you. He appears selfish. (2) No one ever told me I was pretty, but if anyone did and I felt embarrassed (only I'd be tickled pink over it) I'd pass lightly over my compliment and tell the complimentee (I wonder if Noah ever thought of that word?) that her eyes, hair, teeth, ankles or finger-nails were much nicer than mine. (3) Sometimes moles are assets, calling attention by contrast to the skin which should be always well cared for. Ask Katherine Booth about moles and don't do anything to them yourself. That's dangerous.

LONELY WIDOW, Tennessee.—Two years is quite enough to wear mourning and at your age you'd naturally be expected to mingle with young people and to remarry.

V. B., South Dakota.—Go to school by all means, and if your sweetheart is as good as you say he is, he will be willing to wait for you. Don't you think that he would be a jealous husband?—and a jealous husband is a terrible thing—as bad as a jealous wife.

OKLAHOMA BROWNIE, Okla.—Of the two I should think the older man would be the one to marry, certainly not the younger one. But it would be much better to wait until you were so sure of yourself you wouldn't need to ask the advice of another person, though I'm always glad to help if I can.

ANXIOUS, Ark.—No, don't take any chances. You don't know what he might dream next time.

T. N., Texas.—Why not try teaching for a year or two? Then if you still feel that you care for him, marry him and be happy. Ordinarily I wouldn't advise living with in-laws, on either side, but you might be able to work it out satisfactorily. It's better not to as a general rule.

DAISY, La.—Go to high school and then take a business course, or prepare for something else. You can make up your studies, I'm sure.

BOBBY, Montana.—It looks as if you'd have to decide on either one or the other or lose both of them. Don't be selfish.

BETSY, Indiana.—I should say he was fresh, very fresh. Don't write to the firm that employs him to find out what kind of a man he is. I've already told you, and, anyway, don't write.

E. G. B., Colorado.—When a red-haired girl says she wants a certain fellow I suppose she will have him, and if your own relatives can't make you mind I don't see how I can. I still think they know best, though.

HOPELESS CHILD, Tennessee.—It was dear of you to say you wouldn't mind being an old maid if you could be like me. I thank you even if I don't deserve it. At seventeen you don't need to worry about being an old maid. If you can't find a husband within the next thirteen years I'll find one for you. Do you prefer a blond or a brunette husband, or a lean or a fat one? But it won't be necessary for me to go husband hunting for you. You don't want to "get" a sweetheart. If you show that attitude you'll frighten the boys away. Just be a jolly, good-natured girl—yourself, in fact, and don't try to imitate your sisters even if they are successful in geting beaux. Of course it never does any harm to flatter the dear men, carefully, though, carefully, and let them talk to you about themselves. They like it.

DELLA, N. C.—Get all the education you possibly can, but if you have a good opportunity to marry you might as well do it, provided you care enough for him and he can give you a good home. You are so alone in the world that I advise this.

EMMA, N. Y.—I believe a cape such as you mention would be too old for you as I notice they are worn more by old ladies.

R. N., N. Dak.—It isn't bad luck to accept jewelry from men, but it is extremely bad taste and that's much worse.

BLUE EYES, Pa.—Are you sure your parents would object if your sweetheart called on you in your home? He may be all right but I'd have heaps more respect for him if he, at least, attempted to see you there instead of subjecting you to gossip by meeting you on the street. You won't always have your father and mother, and in future years it will make you feel much better to realize that you shared your wedding day with them. They've always been pretty decent about sharing things with you, haven't they? Think this over before running away to be married. It isn't fair to them and you will hurt them very much if you do it. This applies to every girl who has such a crazy idea in her head.

BOBBY, Maine.—As far as I know, a girl can begin her hope chest any time she wants to. If I were a very young girl I'd start my h.c. with dish-towels, sheets, pillow-cases, table-cloths, etc.,—things that don't go out of style, for styles in embroidery change as do styles in everything else.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

BISMARK, N. D.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of dear old COMFORT for a good many years and a subscriber for twenty-two years.

When I read a Hoosier sister's letter I thought I would write and tell her how I cured my two boys of fighting. We came to North Dakota many years ago and took up a homestead. As my husband was away at work most of the time, the children and I were alone and the older boys would fight nearly all the time. One day they were fighting and as I went out to part them I saw a pan of water on the table. They didn't see me until I threw the water over them. That ended that fight. I watched after that and every time they fought they got a pail of water thrown on them. As it was in the summer and the weather was warm it didn't hurt them and it broke them from fighting near the house anyway.

Do the country sisters know that at butchering time if they will grind the lard up before rendering it they will get a third more lard than to just cut it up in the old way?

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

To remove the odor of onions from the hands, moisten and rub with dry mustard. Wash in cold water.

After blankets have been washed and thoroughly dried, and while still on the line, beat with carpet beater and they will become light and soft.

The white of an egg is a good substitute for mucilage.

If greasy foods catch fire in pan or in broiling oven, throw salt onto blaze.

For dark corners of pantry or closet, paint the hooks white and save time when hanging things up. —MRS. L. E. H., Manchester, N. H.

Children's undergarments may be made to stay in place if a piece of elastic is sewed across the bottom of the leg, like a legging, and the child's foot slipped through it. Do not have elastic too tight.

Put tarnished silver in pan and cover with sour milk. Let remain until bright. Wash in soapy water and polish.

A few grains of rice in saltcellar will prevent salt from lumping in damp weather.

Before fastening a meat chopper to table, place a piece of sandpaper under both clamps with rough side next to table. This prevents slipping.

Cream that is too thin for whipping purposes may be used if the unbeaten white of an egg is added before beginning to whip.

Cool pies in a warm room. If cooled too quickly they become soggy.—R. L. D., Boston, Mass.

If worms bother your cabbage, sprinkle them with a solution of borax and water, one tablespoon of borax to one-half gallon of warm water.—MRS. CECIL COOK, Ethridg, Tenn.

To remove grass stains, use ordinary black cooking molasses, rubbed well into the fabric, whether it be cotton, linen or wool, it will remove the stain. Let stay on a few minutes then wash by usual process. It will not injure delicate materials, or color.

Window plants should be sprinkled with cold tea, which keeps the soil free from worms.—MRS. GEO. B. HARLAN, Beaver City, Nebr.

Take ripe, not over ripe, firm tomatoes and put them into a strong brine, as you would cucumbers for pickles. When wanted for use, take out and soak over night.—M. S., Blue, W. Va.

To clean dried apples, use scissors or a sharp knife to remove pieces of core. It is easier to do this before the apples are soaked.—MRS. S. STALEY, Sask., Canada.

To remove the letters from flour sacks, dampen them with kerosene and let stand over night. Wash in strong suds, boil and hang in sun.—MRS. H. D. OSBORNE, News Ferry, Va.

Requests

Wanted: Names and addresses of firms using old carpets and transforming them into woven rugs. —MRS. LUCILLE TRUE, Craig, Colo.

March, 1921, issue of COMFORT.—MISS EMILY LEWIS, Ager, Calif.

Copy of COMFORT containing crocheted pattern of Wild Rose yoke, that has mitered corners. Think it was May, 1915. Have the yoke commenced but cannot finish it without the pattern and full instructions. —MRS. O. B. MERRILL, Waukau, P. O. Box 62, Wisc.

Pattern of Acorn and Oak Leaf knitted lace.—MRS. CARRIE LA DAM, Thistle, Utah.

Mrs. Jennie Jones, Gas City, Ind., would like the Nov. and Dec., 1920, copies of COMFORT, also Jan., 1922. Write first.

Mrs. Pearl Graham, Poplar Bluff, 322 Front St., Mo., wants February, 1920, COMFORT.

How to remove iodine and other stains from ivory.

To hear from someone living where cactus, particularly the thorny top cactus, grows.—TOBITHA VARNER, Mannington, W. Va.

To hear from anyone who crossed the Plains in 1866 in Captain Burns' train and went on boat from The Dalls to Portland, Oregon, in company with the Clark family.—MRS. ISABEL CLARK JENKS, Lewiston, R. R. 1, Box 87, Idaho.

Will some reader who has a copy of Uncle Charlie's Story Book or Book of Poems which they will sell, exchange or loan, please write me. Prefer to hear from someone living in Tennessee or nearby states.—MRS. N. E. SHULTS, Athens, R. R. 3, Tenn.

Remedies

Drink a glass of warm water with a half teaspoon of salt dissolved in it, every morning before breakfast. It is a splendid tonic.—MRS. D. O. EDWARDS, Glendale, Arizona.

PILES.—Take one teaspoon of glycerine three times a day, before meals. It helped me in two weeks' time. —F. H., Arago, Minn.

HEAD LICE.—Two or three applications of sassafras oil will destroy both lice and eggs. I find this is better than kerosene as that is likely to blister and causes more shampooing.—MRS. J. W. H., Black Oak, Arkansas.

RHEUMATISM.—I was a cripple from the age of twelve until I was fifteen, from rheumatism. Now I am well and never feel it. This is what cured me: Oil of Eucalyptus, take three drops first night, five next and seven the third. Skip three nights, repeat again, etc., until relief is gained. Also rub on affected places. This is also good for colds, rub on chest, throat and head or use in atomizer.—FLORENCE HAL, Keene, N. Y.

A Woman's Heart

(Requested.)

A woman's heart is a savings bank
Where the love you deposit lies,
Gathering interest day by day
From the sunshine of the skies.
There isn't a safer place, my lad,
To bury the treasure you'd keep
Than down in its beautiful vaults of dream
Where the tenderest blossoms sleep.
A woman's heart is the place to hide
Whatever you'd treasure best;
For she'll give it back as the years go by
In a love that's more than rest.

A woman's heart is a storage vault,
Where nothing breaks in to steal,
Except the honor you fail to pay
And the love you forget to feel.
A love you have placed there once remains,
And you may forget, but she
Will give it back, if you want it so,
And smile as she hands the key.
Smile, but never forget, my lad,
That a smile is the saddest thing
When it's over the ashes of something dead
And the heart is a broken wing!

A woman's heart is a fortress strong,
Where your foes may never come,
With prancing steeds and gleaming sword
And the rat-tat of the drum.
For that which you treasure she will defend,
And loud as the guns may roll,
She'll stand in the breach to the very end—
And then she will fight with her soul.
A woman's heart—I would rather trust
My all unto that, I know,
For love in the keeping of such a place
Will grow as the blossoms grow.

Self-Command

To go thru' life, beseeching odds of none,
To look forever upwards towards the sun,
But not be dazzled by its brilliant glare,
To hold your own, no matter when nor where;
To feel you know, and know you understand,
These are a few essentials of command.

To judge not, till you know whereof you speak,
For crude opinion stamps a man as weak;
To give aid to your friends who are in need,
Not only by good counsel but by deed;
To hold yourself when wrathful,—well in hand,
All these are attributes of self-command.

To know full well beginning from the first
That you're not one whit better than the worst,
But still remember—when you're put to test,
You are as good as any of the best.
To be kind—yet compelling—to withstand
The pitfalls and temptations. "That's Command,"

By Clara Miehm, in "Telling Tales," May, 1921.
Reprinted in Detroit News, May 31, 1921.

God Bless You!

I seek in tender rhyme, my dear,
My heart's true wish to send you,
That you may know, or far or near,
My loving thoughts attend you.

I cannot find a truer word,
Nor fonder to caress you,
Nor song nor poem I have heard
Is sweeter than "God bless you."

"God bless you," so I've wished you all
Of brightness life possesses;
For can there be any joy for all
Be thine unless God blesses?

"God bless you," so I breathe a charm
Lest grief's dark night oppress you;
Then, how can sorrow bring you harm,
If 'tis God's way to bless you?

And so not "all thy days be fair,
And shadows touch thee never,"
But this alone—God bless thee, dear;
So thou art safe forever.

—Julia Aldrich Bake.

Life's Mirror

BY MADELINE S. BRIDGES.

There are loyal hearts, there are spirits brave,
There are souls that are pure and true;
Then give to the world the best you have
And the best will come back to you.

Give love and love to your life will flow,
A strength in your utmost need;
Have faith, and a score of hearts will show
Their faith in your word and deed.

Give truth and your gift will be paid in kind,
And honor will honor meet;
And a smile that is sweet will surely find
A smile that is just as sweet.

For life is the mirror of king and slave,
'Tis just what we are and do;
Then give to the world the best you have,
And the best will come back to you.

What Sort of a Father Are You?

"What sort of a father are you to your boy?
Do you know if your standing is good?
Do you ever take stock of yourself and check up
Your accounts with your boy as you should?

"Do you ever reflect on your conduct with him?
Are you all that a father should be?
Do you send him away when you are eager to read?
Or let him climb up on your knee?

"Have you time to bestow on the boy when he comes
With his questions, to tell him the truth?
Or do you neglect him and leave him alone
To work out the problems of youth?

"What memories of you will he have
In the years that are certain to come?
Will he look back on youth as a season of joy,
Or an age that was woefully glum?

"Come, father, reflect, does he know you today,
And do you know him now as you should?
Is gold so important to you that you leave
It to chance that your boy will be good?

"Take stock of yourself and consider the lad;
Your time and your thoughts are his due.
How would you answer your God should He ask,
'What sort of a father are you?'"

Science Discovers Greatest Lice Killer

Changes Old Methods. No Dusting or Spraying. Birds Delouse Themselves. Gives Lasting Relief.

A recent discovery promises to revolutionize all the methods accepted up to now for keeping poultry free from lice and mites. This wonderful lice killer keeps the birds always lice free without the poultry raiser doing any work. It is the simplest, easiest, surest and best method ever discovered.

Hick's Lice Kill, which is the name of this sensational lice killer, is added to the drinking water. The medicine taken into the system of the bird comes out through the pores and every louse or mite dies or leaves the body. It does not injure the hatchability or flavor of the eggs or meat; is harmless to chicks and does not affect the plumage. A few days treatment at the start and then a little in the drinking water each month.

A Trial Costs You Nothing

So confident is Mr. Hick that Hick's Lice Kill will kill every louse or mite, that he is making a special guaranteed offer of two regular full sized, double strength, $1.00 bottles and a regular $1.00 package of Hick's Egg-Lay Tablets all for $1.00. Use one bottle yourself and sell the other at one dollar, thus getting your own free. Send $1.00 today (currency, money order, check, etc.) to Chas. M. Hick & Co., Dept. 1175, 1018 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill. If you prefer, send no money, just your name and address, and pay postman $1.00 and postage on delivery. If after two weeks trial you are not absolutely satisfied, write Mr. Hick and your money will be refunded.

Poultry Farming for Women

to get rid of their old feathers and put on a new coat, and if the process is not forced in some way, they will not commence before August, which would make it October before they finished. Of course that would be time enough if it happened to be a warm, late fall, but if cold weather sets in, as it often does in November, hens would not lay before spring, as moulting leaves them in a more or less debilitated condition.

Lots of people make the mistake of selling off hens as soon as they cease laying at this season, which means that they are usually parting with the birds that would make the real winter layers. Hens that lay through the summer and do not cease until the fall will be idle and unprofitable in the winter. It is the general disregard of the moulting period which causes so many failures in the winter supply of eggs. The rule should be to sell off all the hens that have been laying steadily through the summer and commenced to shed feathers in September. Growing feathers is a trying ordeal, and the consequence is that when the hen begins to moult she ceases to lay, for she cannot produce eggs and feathers at the same time.

Feathers are composed largely of nitrogen and mineral matter. That is why the food at moulting time has to be so very nutritious. To feed nothing but corn at such time is simply waste, as the hen cannot produce new feathers from such a diet. If she is on free range she would have a much better chance of gathering the necessary material, but even then, if the feathering process is delayed too long, the hen becomes exhausted, and is susceptible to cold and all sorts of diseases. This is the real reason why roup and swelled head are so prevalent in the fall.

Young birds hatched out in April or thereabouts usually commence to lay in November, because they have not been subject to the drain upon the constitution caused by moulting. But chickens that have been hatched in February or early March are very liable to moult in the late fall, just when they should be commencing to lay. For this reason it is just as well to market all the first hatched chickens, and hold over those hatched late in March or through April, to increase the laying flock.

Cull all your young stock down closely. Don't keep a lot of young cockerels to eat up the profits. Even pullets which are at all backward should be marketed, for they won't develop after cold weather sets in, and it does not pay to keep them for summer layers. Most of the failures made in the poultry business are due to people not having the courage to clean out unproductive birds. Just calculate how many quarts of feed ten growing birds will eat in seven months, and I think you will be convinced that it is unfair to expect the flock to support them and still show a profit. The trouble is that people don't realize that young stock stand still as soon as cold weather starts, remaining almost stationary until spring. Another evil of keeping undeveloped stock is that they occupy house room and crowd the older birds.

A. H. R.—The very quality which is of most value will have been destroyed by the long soaking in waterglass. Inbreeding is always detrimental to size and vigor, but if your old birds are entirely unrelated, one season of mating the young together will not do very much damage. Why don't you start another flock from entirely different blood lines? Buy some eggs from a distant farm, then next year you can make up pairs and trios for sale.

R. B.—This looks terribly like cholera, which is a contagious disease. Clean and disinfect the house and all food and water dishes. Remove all the scratching material from the house and burn. Plow or spade the yards or ground where the birds are in the habit of congregating. Keep a watch on the flock, and as soon as a bird shows slight signs of being out of condition quarantine it in a small coop, far away from the rest of the flock. Generally cholera is shown by great thirst, profuse greenish droppings, and extreme weakness, and can be distinguished from the diarrhea which develops with roup or indigestion by the fact that the victims either show marked improvement or die within forty-eight hours. The best remedy is carbolic acid. Add twenty drops to a gill of water, and use water to mix up a mash with ground grain which has been slightly browned in the oven, and if the bird will not eat, manage to push about a tablespoonful down its throat twice a day. Give no water to drink, or if you do, add ten drops of carbolic acid to each gill, being careful that it is well mixed before being given to the bird.

C. M. P.—If the incubator has ventilators, open them, and air the eggs a little longer every day when you turn them. As there is an excess of moisture in the machine, you certainly must not sprinkle the eggs. We never heard of gas being used to heat an incubator. Of course electricity is used in many machines now. Personally, I think you had better not try the experiment without consulting the maker of the incubator.

M. H.—You would gain nothing by such a course except spoiling the good birds. Fall chicks are profitable if you are near a large city to market them as winter broilers, but it is no use hatching chickens that you are going to keep for egg production after May.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

An introduction is the usual beginning of acquaintanceship and social exchange. Questions coming to this department concerning introductions are many, and a few general rules should prove helpful. The first simple thing to remember in making introductions is that the form is one whose practical purpose is that of making the names of two persons known to each other. Therefore introductions should never be made hastily or stumblingly, and the names of both persons should be distinctly pronounced. Remembering this, these fundamental rules follow:

1—A man is introduced to a woman, except in certain cases, as when some well-known man might be a guest of honor.

2—A young man is introduced to one older than himself.

3—A young woman is introduced to an older or better-known woman.

The observance of these general rules means that in making the introduction the name of the person to whom precedence is given should be spoken first. That is, a formal introduction according to our first rule might be: "Mrs. Dash, may I introduce Mr. Blank?" Or the word "present" may be substituted for "introduce."

There are various matters of circumstance, tact and common sense which, as in all questions of courtesy, affect the manner and form in which introductions are made. Some of these questions will be taken up in this space next month.

TEXAS GIRL.—A simple and suitable luncheon for a girl to order at any restaurant or hotel would be a soup, a salad of some sort—chicken, shrimp, etc.—ice cream or pastry and a cup of tea or coffee. A hot dish of meat or fish may be substituted for the salad if preferred. In some of your local eating places which you say do not even boast menus, you would, we think, have to govern your choice by first finding out what the establishment can furnish, and ordering accordingly. If necessary, a lunch can be reduced to a chicken sandwich, a cup of tea and ice cream and cake when the resources of the eating place's management are limited. As a general rule it is better to order too little than too much—not only for the sake of pleasing your escort's pocketbook, but also to satisfy the male tradition which demands that a girl's appetite should be a dainty one and not established on the ham and eggs, corn beef and cabbage foundation.

M. G., Campbellsville, Ky.—Your parents may suitably ask this young man to stay overnight at your home, if it is inconvenient or impossible for him to return the same evening. (2) As long as a girl rests unengaged, she may have just as many boy friends as she finds pleasant to have follow in her train. Of course, as you say, you "cannot have all of them." This sad fact may "make them mad," but how about the other girls? We should think they would be madder yet.

E. H., Tallahassee, Ala.—After you first "burst-up" and now new difficulty with this boy, you should return his ring to him if you have definitely decided that you will not marry him. You do not say if his being "drunk" is a first occurrence or has been repeated before. You will know best whether you believe it safe to continue your engagement and marry him. Why not put him on probation for a while? In such a case, although you may doubt it, the opinions of your parents and older persons concerning this boy's essential character are worthwhile taking. Why not have told us his age—and yours?

C. S. Y., Grand Rapids, Mich.—Surely you may give this young lady who has been your dancing instructor a gift at the end of the season in sign of your appreciation. Gloves, handkerchiefs, or a pair of shoe buckles would all be appropriate for the occasion.

LONESOME PINE, South Dakota.—When a boy calls for a girl in his car, he may enter the house if he likes, or else wait in the car if he is sure the girl is ready and will be with him in a few minutes. Circumstances might alter the particular case, but as a general rule it would be most natural and courteous for him to enter the house and greet any of the family who might be present. (2) A boy, unless he were a sure and sanguine visitor, does not buy an engagement ring before he has asked the one girl he wants to wear it to marry him. Asking is not always winning or having, and it is the usual method to make sure of the girl first, and to buy the ring afterward. Still we have known young men to have a ring ready in their pockets when they asked the important question—said ring having been a leftover from some affair where the course of true love did not run smoothly.

W. M., Dunbar, Pa.—You are right in not asking this young girl to disobey her parents' wishes and thus encouraging any willingness she may have to meet you unknown to them. Nothing good or happy is apt to come from underhand meetings or lovemaking. We think you are justified in thinking the girl cares something for you by her being ready to evade her parents' objections, but we cannot say that this willingness on her part makes her any more worth your admiration. Let both of you act straightforwardly, as you seem inclined to do, for there is time enough, at eighteen, for objections to melt or change.

I. P., Lena, Wisc.—A girl of sixteen should not be at a dance where it is necessary that she should be asked to dance by a man she does not know. Your partners at any dance should be those boys you know and those who may be presented to you by your boy and girl friends. (2) A girl should be chary of beginning a correspondence. Whether you would answer a letter received from a boy you had "only seen once" would depend upon what sort of a boy the writer was and what kind of a letter he had written to you.

M. S., Millboro, N. C.—Your letter does not quite make clear if it is you or these boys who are "opposed to hugging." We are giving you the benefit of the doubt and imagine that it is you who are the objector. The stopping of the annoyance should be simple: tell this too-affectionate youth that you do not intend to let him play the bear, and that if he does not cease the practice you will select another escort for your Sunday afternoon strolls home from church. And let him see you mean what you say.

M. G., South Dakota.—A girl is not introduced to a boy; he is presented to her. Yes; it would be perfectly correct for you to ask your girl friend to introduce this boy to you. (2) There would be nothing improper in your leaving the dance floor with your partner during a dance, but you should not make this absence long enough to cause comment among your friends.

J. F.—From the description of the feathers of the birds, I think the hens must be infested with what is known as the depleting mite, which feeds on the quills of the feathers. Clean and disinfect the houses, perches and nests, thoroughly disinfect and then whitewash. Add one ounce of crude carbolic acid to two ounces of powdered glue to every pail of whitewash. Make rather thicker than usual, and be sure that you get plenty of it into all the cracks and crevices. I can't quite understand what is the matter with the pullet. Do you use very much vinegar and oil on your table? What about dishwater? Have you a drain which carries it off? What about water on wash day? It often happens that that is thrown out on the surface of the ground, where it forms in little pools, where the hens can drink it, and if any amount of washing powder has been used for very soiled things, it is very apt to cause crop troubles and inflammation of the intestines. Act on these suggestions and try to discover what has caused the trouble, then remove it.

Do You Want $200 a Week?

The Amazing Story of Carl Rowe Who Rose from an Income of $50 a Week to $1000 a Month

My name is Rowe—Carl Rowe. I live in a small city in New York State.

I am going to tell you an amazing story about myself. It may seem too strange to believe, but you can easily verify everything I have to say.

Two years ago I was a baker. I was struggling along, trying to make the money in my pay envelope meet the increasing expenses of our family. There was no prospect for the future.

Today, just two years later, I am a successful business man. I have plenty of money for all the things we need and want. Last month I made $876 during my spare time, and was able to put $200 a week in my savings account. I am going to tell you how it happened.

Please remember that two years ago I had no surplus cash. I was in the same fix as nine out of ten other men. Expenses were constantly mounting and my salary, although it had increased, could not keep pace with the cost of living. My wife had to do without things that I knew she ought to have. We wanted an automobile, but we couldn't afford it. We wanted to buy our own home, but we couldn't afford that.

It made me desperate to think of what might happen if I became sick or lost my job. I worried about it, and so did my wife. We were living from hand to mouth, and we didn't know what calamity and hardships might be lurking just around the corner.

And yet—today—I own our nine-room house. I have an automobile. I have money for books, the theatre, or any other pleasures that I may want. I have the cash today to educate my son and send him through college.

Here is how it happened. One day in glancing through a magazine I read an advertisement. The advertisment said that any man could make from a hundred to three hundred dollars a month during his spare time.

I didn't believe it. I knew that I had worked hard eight hours a day for $50 a week, and I figured that no man could make that much during a couple of hours a day spare time.

But as I read that ad I found that it pointed to men who had made that much and more. In the last paragraph the advertiser offered to send a book without cost. I still doubted. But I thought it was worth a two-cent stamp, so I tore out the coupon and put it in my pocket and next day on my way home from work I mailed it.

When I look back to that day and realise how close I came to passing up that ad, it sends cold chills down my spine. If the book had cost me a thousand dollars instead of a two-cent stamp, it would still have been cheap. All that I have today—an automobile, my home, an established business, a contented family—all these are due to the things I learned by reading that little eight-page booklet.

There is no secret to my success. I have succeeded beyond any dream I may have had three years ago, and I consider myself an average man. I believe that I would be criminally selfish if I did not tell other people how I made my success.

All the work I have done has been pleasant and easy, and withal, amazingly simple. I am the representative in this territory for a raincoat manufacturer. The booklet that I read was one issued by that company. It tells any man or woman just what it told me. It offers to anyone the same opportunity that was offered to me. It will give to anyone the same success that it has brought to me.

The Comer Manufacturing Company is one of the largest manufacturers of high-grade raincoats on the market; but they do not sell through stores. They sell their coats through local representatives. The local representative does not have to buy a stock—he does not have to invest any money. All he does is to take orders for Comer raincoats and he gets his profit the same day the order is taken. Fully half my customers come to my house to give me their orders.

My business is growing bigger every month. I don't know how great it will grow, but there are very few business men in this city whose net profit is greater than mine, and I can see only unlimited opportunity in the future.

* * * * *

If you are interested in increasing your income from $100 to $1000 a month and can devote all your time or only an hour or so a day to this same proposition in your territory, write the Comer Manufacturing Company at Dayton, Ohio. Simply sign the attached coupon and they will send you the eight-page booklet referred to by Mr. Rowe and full details of their remarkable proposition.

Big Profits for Women

The Comer Manufacturing Company has an unusual opportunity open to women that will enable them to make at least $2.00 an hour in their spare time. Maggie McCoy of Georgia makes from $275 to $350 a month as a Gomer Representative. Mrs. J. W. McCrary made $253 in less than two months' easy spare time work. Mrs. Goldie Nielsen earned a profit of $23 in her first three hours' work. Mrs. Jennie O'Ross made almost $50 in 5 days' spare time.

Any woman who fills out the coupon below will learn how to make her spare time pay big cash profits.

Cut Out and Mail

The Comer Mfg. Co.,
Dept. J-146, Dayton, Ohio.

Gentlemen: Please send me without obligation on my part, copy of your booklet and full details of your proposition.

Wrist Watch

Reward No. 75210

For Men And Boys

For A Club Of Only Ten

THE Wrist Watch is no longer considered effeminate or a "fad." Men and boys in all walks of life now wear them. The millions of American soldiers who went to France—from general down to dough-boy—wore them. It is a practical, common-sense method of carrying a watch.

The watch shown here is the "Leonard"—designed especially for farmers, lumbermen surveyors, miners, campers, hunters, fishermen, etc. It is 6 size, fitted with high-grade American movement, stem wind and pendant set in strong, dust-proof, silver-nickel case with a thick, heavy crystal that cannot easily be broken.

The strap is made of goat skin, of good width, very tough yet pliable and easy on the wrist. It fastens with a nickel-plated buckle which does not come in contact with the skin. This strap may be adjusted to fit the wrist of a small boy or a full-grown man.

This also makes a splendid wrist watch for the women and girls on the farm. It is just what they need when engaged in outdoor work and to wear on motoring trips and on all occasions where it would not be advisable to wear a more expensive watch.

Remember—this watch is fully guaranteed to keep good time. If it fails to do so or proves defective in any way within one year we will either repair or exchange it free of charge. It is yours free on the terms of the following special offer.

Given To You! For ten one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each we will send you this fine Wrist Watch exactly as described free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 75210.

"Peggy" The New Summer Doll

She Is Looking For A Mother

Do You Want Her?

PEGGY first saw the light of day in New York but she didn't like the big city with its noise and confusion and was mighty glad to come to Maine on a brief vacation before looking for a permanent home somewhere in the country.

She doesn't care where she lives so long as as it is in some cozy little town or on a nice, big farm, and provided she can find some little girl who will be a kind mother to her. She just loves the horses and cows and doggies and kitties and—yes, even the little "piggies" make her laugh until she can hardly stand up.

Peggy says that life on the farm is the only life for her, so we want to give her to some little girl who lives on a farm, where she can romp and play to her heart's content and be happy all day long. Please remember, however, that we have but a limited number of these Dolls on hand and if you want one your order should be sent in at once.

A New York manufacturer who wanted to keep his help busy during the dull season sold us these Dolls at about one-half the regular wholesale price, so we are enabled to give them away for almost nothing.

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you "Peggy" free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8621.

New Thin Model The Leonard "Earl" Watch

Reward No. 7557

For A Club Of Seven

AFTER searching the market for a reliable, up-to-date timepiece for our men and boy readers, we selected the Leonard "Earl" because we believe it is the best watch in the world for the money. The case is composition nickel-silver which wears as well as solid silver, a 12 size, open face, thin model with antique bow and flat crown. The movement is guaranteed American made, stem wind, pull-out pendant set, with pure white dial and plain, easily-read Arabic numerals.

As shown in our illustration, the "Earl" has the classy appearance of a $25.00 watch and after testing it we find it to be an excellent timekeeper. We therefore feel no hesitancy in recommending the "Earl" to any man or boy who wants a watch that is not only a good timekeeper but a "good-looker"—a watch that you can show your friends and carry anywhere with pride and satisfaction. It is yours free if you will accept the following special offer.

Given To You! For seven one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this Leonard "Earl" watch free by parcel post prepaid. With it you will also receive a factory guarantee allowing you to exchange it for a new watch if it does not prove entirely satisfactory. Reward No. 7557.

Antique Wall Clock

Hand Colored Face

Reward No. 8194.

For A Club Of Four

If you like things unique, you will be charmed with this novelty clock which is very similar in design to those used in some parts of Europe in the Eighteenth Century.

As shown in our illustration, which is greatly reduced in size, the face of the clock consists of a beautiful landscape hand painted in four colors, beneath which is a metal dial with large, easily-read figures. Then there are the brass chains and weights and brass pendulum with regulator which give the clock that antique appearance so much in demand nowadays.

This clock is useful as well as ornamental being an excellent timekeeper. It has a fully guaranteed brass movement, key wind, in a polished nickel case. This movement is regulated by the disk on the pendulum which is easily adjusted to make the clock run faster or slower as desired. A hanger attached to the back of the clock enables one to hang it on any desirable location on the wall.

We were so sure that our club raisers would be pleased with this clock we had a large quantity imported for us at a special low price. We are now giving them away free on the terms of the following special offer.

Given To You! For a club of four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each, we will send you this unique novelty clock exactly as illustrated and described free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8194.

Beaded Coin Purse

Reward No. 8224

For A Club Of Four

The New 1922 Purse

ONE of the leading styles this season is this handsome beaded purse with black crocheted top which closes with a draw-string made of black twist. It is about seven inches deep and five inches wide when lying flat. The beads are sewed directly to the strong poplin lining and their flashing, iridescent colors are a delight to the eye. Blue is the predominating color of the beads while around the top and bottom there are three rows of gold, green and amber beads. The finishing touch is given with a three-inch tassel of blue and black beads.

A leading New York concern showed us this purse and it pleased us so well that we decided to include it among COMFORT'S club rewards. You can have one of these stylish and handsome beaded purses if you will accept the following special offer.

Given To You! For four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each we will send you this beaded purse free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8224.

This Beautiful Crystal Necklace

Topaz Amethyst Emerald Sapphire

For A Club Of Only Two!

RIGHT from New York, the center of fashion, comes this new, stylish necklace and we were indeed fortunate in obtaining a good supply of them. We only wish we could show it in its actual colors because mere words fail to do it justice. It is thirty inches long, composed of brilliant crystal cut beads, alternating with seed beads, with transparent long oval and round bead ornamentations and tassel. It comes in four different colors—Topaz, Amethyst, Emerald and Sapphire.

City people of course have no difficulty in obtaining the newest styles in necklaces. But COMFORT'S women and girl readers live in the country, far from the up-to-date stores—and that's why we make this offer. This is your opportunity to secure a necklace as handsome and stylish as any that will be seen anywhere this season. And best of all, it will not cost you one cent if you will accept the following special offer.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50c each we will send you this beautiful crystal bead necklace free by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to mention color wanted. Reward No. 1142.

26-Piece Table Set

Given For A Club Of Only Five

WE have made many offers of table-ware, but this is the first time we have been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for so small a club. And please don't think that because we are giving this set on such liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. On the contrary, it has a white metal base; therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration, there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a reward for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have offered and we guarantee every set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this 26-Piece Table Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special offer.

Given To You! For a club of five one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Table Set free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 7625.

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

V. F. L., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the community property (that is such as is purchased or acquired by onerous title during marriage) all goes to the surviving husband or wife upon the death of either, leaving no child nor descendant; we think the separate real estate of the decedent is subject to another disposition in case the decedent leaves no will.

E. W. N., So. Dakota.—If your brother refuses to account to you for your share of the proceeds of the property he has leased to the agent of your father's estate, we think it will be necessary for you to bring an action against him to compel him to do so; we do not think he has any legal right to cut the timber for his own use without paying you for your share of the same.

Miss E. P., Pennsylvania.—We do not think that marriages between first cousins are prohibited by the laws of Alabama, California, Colorado, Delaware, Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts, Nebraska, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Texas, Virginia and Washington.

Mrs. S. R. McC., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, one-half of the real estate and all of the personal estate, after the payment of debts and expenses, would go to the surviving widow.

Mrs. T. Q., Washington.—We are of the opinion that the woman you mention has a legal right to convey her property to one of her children to the exclusion of her other children if she so desires, provided she possesses the proper mental capacity, and provided no undue influence is exercised upon her in connection therewith; we think, however, the courts are apt to closely scrutinize deeds of this nature in case an action is brought to set same aside.

I. J., Idaho.—Under the laws of Utah, we are of the opinion that if the property you mention all stood in your father's name it would have been necessary for your mother to have survived him to have acquired a vested right therein, and that upon her death before him you acquired no inheritance rights in the property except such as you may have from your father's estate, in case you are not disinherited by his will.

M. W., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the dower of the wife and the curtesy of the husband in the real estate of each other cannot be affected by a will unless the provisions of the will in that respect are accepted by the non-rejection of the provisions of the will within a specified time after the probate thereof in a certain formal way.

J. F. K., Idaho.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, his surviving widow, in addition to certain allowance, would receive one-half of the estate, the remaining one-half going to his father and mother equally; if no parent, the whole estate would go to the surviving widow.

Mrs. W. A., Maine.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child nor descendant, his widow, in addition to some small allowances, would receive one-half of his estate, the balance going to his kindred, depending upon who is left; if no kindred, the whole estate would go to his surviving widow.

M. E. M., Louisiana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the share of your infant child in the father's estate, upon the death of such infant would go one-half to you and one-half to the brothers and sisters of the father, or their descendants in equal shares.

Mrs. C. E. N., Connecticut.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the executor or trustee of the estate of your ancestor refuses to account for his proceedings in the estate, after the expiration of the time allowed for administering such estate, you can compel him to do so in the proper proceedings brought for that purpose in the court from which he procured his appointment.

J. C. H., Oregon.—We think that if you have a proper reason for having your name legally changed, you should present your petition to the Supreme Court of your state; we think it will be necessary for you to employ a lawyer to draw and present this petition for you.

Mrs. L. M., New Jersey.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no child nor descendant her surviving husband, after payment of debts and expenses, would receive all the balance of the personal estate; he would also receive his curtesy of a life estate in the real estate if there had been any child born alive to the marriage, if none such, he would be limited to a one-third interest in the real estate, except in cases where decedent left no children, brothers, sisters nor parents.

Mrs. M. V. P., Maryland.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of an unmarried man, leaving no child nor descendant, and leaving no will, his parents would receive his estate, subject to payment of his debts, and the expenses of administration. (2) We think the property you mention can only be sold subject to the mortgage lien thereon, provided such mortgage is properly recorded, and is a valid lien thereon.

W. G., Florida.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no will, her estate, after payment of debts and expenses, would go to her husband and children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share. (2) We think that children may be disinherited by will.

Mrs. H. R., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the verbal contract between the landlord you mention and his tenant became abrogated as soon as the same was reduced to a written contract, and that upon the signing and delivery of the written contract both parties thereto became bound thereby.

Mrs. T. W. M., Wisconsin.—We think if your father died leaving no will, an administrator should be appointed to administer the personal property of the estate, if he left any such property; we think that the deed of all the parties in interest would convey the real estate, without administration, in case all the debts and expenses of the estate have been paid.

Mrs. A. R., South Dakota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the mortgage you mention will bear interest until paid regardless of whether it is overdue or not, unless, of course, no interest is paid, nor any other evidence of indebtedness given for the period limited by the statute of limitations.

A. W., Missouri.—We think that in the event of a contest of the will you mention it would be difficult for the man who drew it to establish same, if he was a beneficiary thereunder, and the testator was an illiterate, unless he can produce other testimony to show that the illiterate testator desired to leave him the bequest as specified in the will.

Mrs. R. H., Ohio.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the deed you mention created a tenancy by the entirety in the husband and wife, the whole property, upon the death of one, became the sole property of the survivor, but that if the property belonged to the husband alone, and came to him by onerous title, upon his death without a will, his widow would receive a one-third interest for life therein, and that in addition thereto she would receive certain small allowance from the personal estate and one-half of the balance of the personalty up to a value of $400, and one-third of the balance of the estate going to his child or children and their descendants; we do not think his widow's child by a former marriage would have any interest in his estate, unless some provision was made for him by will.

Mrs. M. S., Alabama.—Under the laws of Tennessee, we are of the opinion that the property which came to you from your mother's estate, during your minority should have been administered by a general guardian appointed for that purpose, and that if such general guardian has refused to account to you it will be necessary for you to bring a proceeding against him to compel him to do so.

Mrs. W. C. G., Washington.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if there is no agreement to the contrary, the purchaser of the personal property you mention can be compelled to pay for same when he receives such property.

Mrs. J. A. H., Georgia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, after payment of debts and expenses, his widow would be entitled to receive a child's part in both the real and personal estate, unless the shares exceed five, in which case the widow takes one-fifth; should she, however, elect to take dower of a one-third interest for life in the real estate, she would be barred from her child's part in the real estate as she is not entitled to receive both dower and a child's share in such property.

E. F. C., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the father you mention has a legal right to appoint his son executor of his will, and to limit the shares of his children from his estate as he may see fit, provided he possesses testamentary capacity, and provided no undue influence is exercised upon him, and provided the will is legally drawn and executed, and expresses his true intent.

Mrs. N. W., Wisconsin.—We do not think your neighbor has any legal right to build his house in such manner as to run his rain water upon your property.

Miss H. B., Texas.—We think that if it is impossible to partition the land of the estate you mention among the heirs entitled to share therein, it will be necessary to have the property sold and the money proceeds of the sale divided among the heirs in their proper proportion; we think any party having a vested fee interest in this land can bring an action for this purpose.

Mrs. M. B., Louisiana.—We think the young man whose parents had their name legally changed during his infancy should continue to use his parent's name as so changed.

Stella Rosevelt

"Uncle Jacob, you cannot mean what you have said. Surely you will not discard those of your own blood, your kin, for the offspring of a stranger!" Mrs. Richards said, appealingly.

Mr. Rosevelt looked down at Star with a tender, tremulous smile.

"The offspring of a stranger!" he repeated, softly; then added: "Ellen, there is a stronger bond uniting this dear child to me than ever bound me to either of my brother's children."

"What do you mean?" cried his niece, in a startled tone. "Surely, at your age, you do not contemplate——"

Mr. Rosevelt stopped her with a motion of his hand before she could complete her sentence.

"No; you are wide of the mark; although I am not surprised that a designing woman like yourself should jump at such an absurd conclusion. But, lest you should wound her by your foolish insinuations, I will tell you that Star is the granddaughter of the only woman whom I ever loved; and, therefore, you perceive that I had additional cause to be displeased with you on account of your unkindness to her."

"Really, Mr. Rosevelt, you have more of sentiment in your composition than I gave you credit for. There was a love passage, then, in the old bachelor's life!" sneered Mrs. Richards, while an angry flush mounted to her brow.

Then, with more bitterness than she had yet betrayed, she continued, with a look at Star:

"I can congratulate Miss Gladstone upon being more successful in wheedling you out of your fortune than she was in her maneuvers to become Lady Carrol."

This was a cruel thrust, and wholly unexpected on the part of either Mr. Rosevelt or Star.

A shiver of agony ran through every nerve of her body at this rough probing of the still unhealed wound, and a painful crimson shot over her beautiful face.

But it quickly subsided, leaving only the bright spots on her cheeks.

She arose from the chair where Mr. Rosevelt had placed her, drew herself up proudly, her eyes gleaming as bright as the diamonds in her ears, and, entirely ignoring the coarse woman's malicious thrust, she looked up at her companion, and said, in her clearest, sweetest tones:

"Uncle Jacob, I believe we were going out to see the illumination."

"True, child, true," he said, taking her white-gloved hand and laying it upon his arm, while he cast a dark look upon his niece for her cowardly attack. "Come, we will go at once;" and with a formal inclination to Mrs. Richards and her daughter, but with an angry gleam in his eyes, he led Star from the room, shutting the door, with no gentle sound, after them.

TO BE CONTINUED.

The Pied Piper of New York

By Frances L. Garside

Copyright, 1923, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE great big clock of the seasons has no restraining, or encouraging, influence on the children of New York. The hand that points to the months means nothing to them, for never does it mark a limit for their outdoor activities. They play out in winter the same as in summer; the snow does not frighten them; there are protecting corners and doorways when it rains; perambulators line the walks, each containing a child, in as great number in January as in June; one may not tell from the sound floating up from the pavement of children's laughter, squeals, screams and shrieks, if it is mid-summer or mid-winter.

If the New York mother were asked why, she might reply it is because the fresh air is better for the child, but there is a reason older in influencing her than this: landlords made life unpleasant for tenants whose children danced and romped in the house long before Fresh Air became a national movement; the tenant below who was quick to call up and complain that her ceilings were coming down had a voice more powerful than that of the advocates of the great outdoors; the cramped quarters in which New Yorkers live was another influence. In an apartment so small that the family clock has been traded for a wrist watch there is no room for the activities of a child.

Some mothers turn their children over to an over-worked Providence; others, on camp chairs, sit outside all day; and others with a faith that is seldom justified, rely on a nurse girl; in more families the oldest girl-child of the mature age of six becomes the guardian for those who are younger. The "Little Mothers" of New York are one of its greatest tragedies.

They find much to amuse them, these children of the streets. A hurdy-gurdy comes along. During the war these hurdy-gurdies played but two tunes, the sextette from "Lucia," and "America." In these days of alleged peace one still hears the sextette, but not always "America." More often, incongruous as it may seem, for the man who owns and grinds this perambulating opera house is an Italian, one hears "Nearer, My God, to Thee," an air to which the feet of the New York child dance as lightly as to any other, for they do dance, these children, singly, by twos, in a circle, whenever a hurdy-gurdy starts up.

More rarely there is the carousal (pronounced kar-o-sall) by those who furnish pennies for a ride; a miniature merry-go-round in a wagon drawn by a very low-spirited horse. The driver grinds a crank at the back, the merry-go-round turns, and somewhere from the bowels of the wagon there issues a continuation of squeaks, sounding more like a protest than a tune.

But these attractions pale before the Pied Piper, though he assumes no pleasing guise to tempt the children to follow him. Unlike the Pied Piper of Hamelin, he hasn't lips where smiles went out and in, and sharp blue eyes, each like a pin; he has no smiles on his lips; his eyes are fierce with anger, and sometimes swollen and black, or covered with blood, the result of a blow. He is a law breaker, and at his heels there trails a procession of children as eager, as content only to be following though they know not where, as those who trotted down the streets of Hamelin Town entranced by the strains of a pipe that promised flowers of fairer hue, sparrows brighter than peacocks, honey bees that had lost their stings, and horses born with eagles' wings.

They follow, block after block; games forgotten, responsibilities not left behind for the little mothers wheel their charges in perambulators, straining every muscle to keep up, or they drag those on feet by the hand; they dodge in between street cars and automobiles; they heed neither danger nor time nor distance; they are not as noisy as when at play, for curiosity has taken possession of their souls. Some fortunate ones have seen the beginning. They are great personages on this occasion; others arrived on the scene with the policeman; but, early or late, it is a great occasion. It is typical of life in a great city, the pet boast of its confirmed inhabitants being that in New York "there is always something going on."

The procession stops, perhaps, at a police box. The boy, or girl, is proud, indeed, who is so close on the officer's heels he, or she, hears what he says; it is almost as great joy as being close enough to the law-breaker to touch his garment, to get a close-up view of the blood on his face and clothes, and, oh, what more could life hold than this? Occasionally, the officer has two men by the arms, and has to blow his whistle for help! The promises made by the original man with his entrancing pipe are bucolic—one might almost say "Sissy"—in comparison.

The patrol wagon arrives; some of the procession have run like mad down the street to meet it, drowning its shrill bells with screams of "Here she comes, officer!" "Here she comes!" "I saw her first!" Others, with rare foresight, do not wait to see the man dragged into it; they run ahead many blocks, perhaps half a mile away, that they may get front places at the entrance to the police station, and be the proud bearers of news to other children that there's a cop coming with a load. The New York Paul Revere has not failed; as large a crowd awaits the patrol wagon as it left behind it, increased by the crowd that comes straggling along the street, no child in it a whit discouraged, disinterested or tired. The enthusiasm doesn't wane until the Pied Piper has disappeared into the station and the wagon has been driven away.

One may see such a procession any day in any section of the city. "Oh, see," says a visiting friend, pointing to a group of children coming down the streets, "It must be a Sunday school procession. Let's wait and see it. I think these Sunday school processions are wonderful for stimulating interest. Do you suppose we could tag along and be present at the exercises?"

She turned faint when they came close enough for her to see the man at the head; so covered with blood, which was still pouring from a wound on his forehead, that one could not tell if he were black or white, but close on his heels a hundred children trotted eagerly, children ranging in age from the baby in its perambulator to the child of ten.

One wonders, on seeing them, on hearing their eager voices, if they, too, some day, like the children who tripped and skipped with shouting and laughter through the door in the mountain-side which shut tight after them—if they, too, will become "a tribe of alien people."

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address, The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

Mrs. L. G. W., Yeddo, Ind.—If the bunions are of long standing and cannot be relieved by shoes made to order to relieve the pressure, operation is the only remedy.

Mrs. W. H. P., Newark, Ohio.—Symptoms of high blood pressure are dizziness or vertigo, headache and a full bounding pulse. High blood pressure may be only imaginary and the only way to find out whether or not you have high blood pressure is to have your local doctor ascertain the facts by using a high blood-pressure apparatus. The causes are various. Excessive indulgence in foods, especially starchy foods, is the most common cause. The remedy follows: a lower and simple diet, use of cathartics to keep the bowels free at all times, and taking ten drops of a saturated solution of iodide of potassium, well diluted, after meals for a long time, or until the system is saturated with the remedy.

Mrs. J. E. B., Logan, Ohio.—As so many times indicated in COMFORT, the one best cathartic for chronic constipation is some form of cascara sagrada. Take one or two pills of this drug at night, eat freely of fruit, and, with your meals, take a tablespoonful of American Oil.

Mr. L. B. C., Rudsville, N. C.—"Bashfulness" is a neurosis—a habit. Just mix in with people and in a while you will overcome your diffidence.

Miss E. M. G., Westlake, Idaho.—High blood pressure is due to faulty eating; especially foods that contain carbo-hydrates in excess. High blood pressure is not common in young people. Bright's disease is the one cause of high blood pressure in the young. Avoid sweets of all kinds and live upon green vegetables, milk and other simple and easily-digested food.

Mrs. E. D., Selkirk, Kansas.—Operation is the only cure for the hemorrhoidal condition mentioned, especially as your husband is passing so much blood.

Mrs. G. C. W., Royse City, Texas.—Your son has adenoids, without doubt. Have him operated on at once. You should consult some good oculist and have your eyes treated also. Probably you need correcting lenses. The growth mentioned may be caused by eye-strain.

Mrs. H. H. L., New Germany, Minn.—Probably your liver is at fault. Take at night one compound cathartic pill, avoid sweets of all kinds, and exercise in the open as much as possible.

Mrs. J. F. H., Toledo, Ohio.—Maybe your mother needs eyeglasses. If she is bilious, have her take one compound cathartic pill at night, for three nights. Of course she must avoid sweets of all kinds.

Miss C. B., Greenville, S. C.—Better live on milk and eggs and take, after meals, a tablespoonful of Maltine and Cod-liver Oil. You probably need easily-digested food and those foods that will not cause the formation of gas in the intestines. Your heart action is probably secondary.

Miss L. D. W., Goessel, Kans.—Massage the small breast with cocoa-butter daily. A slight stimulation of this nature will develop the breast if persisted in for some time.

Miss E. L., Napa, Calif.—Take one or two cascara sagrada pills at night for the constipation. For the bladder trouble, take a five-grain tablet of urotropin after meals, and drink plenty of water.

Mrs. G. A., Melba, Idaho.—Operation is the only thing to suggest for actual relief from bleeding piles. Your husband can apply locally any compound gall ointment which is official.

Mr. O. B., Beaver Dam, Ky.—Better give the child some cod liver oil and aid or prevent what seems to be a form of rickets, and await the result.

Miss D. M., Lecontes, Pa.—Massage the bust gently with cocoa-butter. You can also take two-grain capsules of corpus luteum morning and night. The offensive odor of perspiration will be overcome by bathing with a solution of sodium salicylate—about a tablespoonful of the drug to a quart of water. For the loss and discoloration of hair apply a two per cent. lotion of resorcin dissolved in equal parts of alcohol and rose-water. Apply the lotion at night after shampooing the hair. Do not apply any "hair restorer" at any time.

Mrs. W. R. W., Cisco, Texas.—"Hot flashes" due to change of life are best treated by use of two-grain capsules of ovarian substance taken morning and night for several weeks.

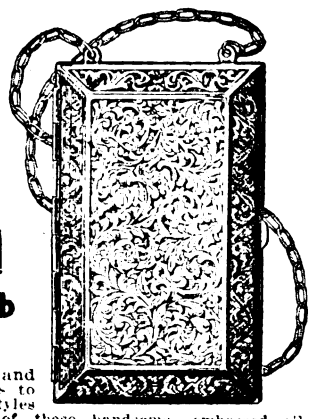
Mrs. J. Q., Washington, D. C.—Apply hot mustard fomentations over the enlarged liver at night, and take one or two compound cathartic pills at night to keep the bowels moving. You can also take a tablespoonful of American oil with your meals.

Mrs. I. F. W., Jefferson, Mo.—Closure of the tear duct causes the excessive flow of tears over the eyelid. Have the tear-duct opened, or dilated.

Mr. D. E. S., Ponca City, Okla.—Better consult your local doctor and he will show you how he gives the treatment for an enlarged prostate. Take, after meals, a compound bicarbonate of soda tablet for the stomach condition mentioned. The prostate gland is massaged through the rectum.

Mr. J. M. C., Tucker Hill, Va.—If you have "sugar in the blood" and urine you must avoid sweets of all kinds; take ten-grain tablets of bicarbonate of soda after meals; drink plenty of water, and live mostly on green vegetables and meats.

SELF-FILLING Fountain Pen



For A Club Of Three

HERE is a fountain pen that we can positively guarantee. Perhaps you have had some experience with fountain pens which never would write well and continually leaked ink all over your fingers. If so you will certainly appreciate this opportunity to secure a fountain pen that has none of these defects. Our illustration is of course greatly reduced in size. The pen offered you here is 6½ inches long, made entirely of hard rubber, finely finished, and the pen point is genuine 14-K gold. The feeding device is perfect, permitting a uniform flow of ink and it will not leak. Also please notice that this is a self-filling pen. You can fill this fountain pen in less than 10 seconds by pressing down the spring on the side, then placing the pen point in a bottle of ink, after which you release the spring and the pen is instantly filled with ink to its full capacity. If given proper care this pen should last anybody for years. If you will accept the following special offer we will send you one of these self-filling fountain pens with a positive guarantee that if it fails to prove satisfactory in any way you may return it to us and we will replace it with a new pen free of charge.

Club Offer. For a club of only three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this guaranteed self-filling fountain pen free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. 8873.

For a Club of Four

BEADWORK is all the rage again. And here is a wonderful yet simple Bead Loom with which any woman or girl can take up this fascinating work at home and easily make the handsomest bags, chains, necklaces, purses, bracelets, belts, collars and cuffs, dress trimmings, shirtwaist sets, slippers, watch cases, fob chains, card cases, pocketbooks,—in fact there is no limit to the number and variety of exquisitely colored bead work articles that can be woven on this Loom.

Anybody can use the "Kanibas" Bead Loom—it is very easy to understand as everything is fully explained in the instruction book sent with the outfit.

Everything you need to work with is included free with the Loom, so you can begin making the articles at once.

In the outfit you will receive one "Kanibas" Bead Loom, five packages of beads in assorted colors of black, white, blue, green, pink, etc., one dozen special bead needles (very long and slender with an unusually long eye), one spool of specially prepared waxed bead thread, and a 44-page instruction book containing more than seventy-five photographs and designs of popular bead work, together with easy, detailed instructions on just what color of beads to use and how to work them.

This book shows how to make different styles of bags, chains, necklaces, purses, belts, collars and cuffs, shirtwaist sets, slippers, watch cases, fob chains, card cases, pocketbooks, dress trimmings, any letter in the alphabet, any numeral, etc., etc.,—giving full directions for all designs. The popular secret order emblems can be worked with great effect in beads for fob chains, bracelets, card cases, etc., and this book illustrates designs for Masons, Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, Knights of Columbus, Elks, Royal Arcanum, also Christian Endeavor, Epworth League and others.

Any woman or girl will be delighted with this practical Loom Outfit because she can make so many pretty things not only for her own use but to give away as presents and to sell. While the beads themselves cost but little, the finished work brings a high price so that there are big profits in the business, if one desires to sell the articles after they are made.

Special Club Offer. For four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you the "Kanibas" Bead Loom and Outfit free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 8234.

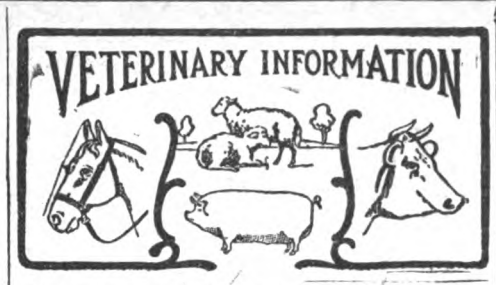
Send Only Three Subscriptions For This Cut Glass Sugar and Creamer—Or Two Subscriptions For The Pickle Dish Or Spoon Tray!

WE want to ask our women readers—did you ever see or hear of a more remarkable offer?

Just think of the small number of subscriptions required to earn any one or all of these beautiful cut glass pieces.

And it is real cut glass—of good weight and thickness—clear, brilliant, crystal glass, exquisitely hand cut in a new and beautiful design. Each piece is full size with the same handsome floral pattern that twines completely around the outside in graceful curves, while on the bottom of each piece is a heavily cut, many-pointed star. The rim of both sugar and creamer is deeply notched.

Do you wonder how we can make this offer? A certain factory, realizing that we shall probably use thousands of these sets, has made us an unusually low price. That's the whole story. And the result is we can give you your choice of this rich genuine cut glass absolutely free in return for the easiest half hour's work you ever did.



We Prepay Charges And Positively Guarantee Safe Delivery

Any or all of these pieces can be safely mailed by parcel post. We pay all postage and guarantee safe delivery to your home. If by chance a piece should become broken (something that rarely happens) we will replace it free of charge.

We know that every woman that receives one or more of these rich cut glass pieces will be amazed and delighted with the bargain she has obtained. It is easily the greatest value in a premium that we have ever been able to offer. We will give you your choice of the Sugar and Creamer, or the Pickle Dish, or the Spoon Tray absolutely free on the terms of the following special

Club Offers. For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you the Sugar and Creamer by prepaid insured parcel post. (Reward No. 8883). Or for two one-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you your choice of either the Pickle Dish (Reward No. 9402), or the Spoon Tray (Reward No. 9412). Or we will send you the complete set of all four pieces free and prepaid for a club of seven one-year subscriptions at 50 cents each. (Reward No. 7457).

Blood in Milk

IT is quite common for the first milk of a new-calved heifer to contain blood. It may come in small quantities at the end of the milking operation, or clear blood may come instead of milk. In other cases one finds clots of blood in the milk after it has stood for some time. Profuse bleeding affects all of the teats. The small amounts of blood usually come from one teat or quarter, but several may be affected. The cause of profuse bleeding in a heifer with her first calf is such great distention or congestion of the udder with blood that tiny blood vessels rupture and discharge their contents into the little chambers in which milk is secreted. Great congestion usually indicates that the heifer is to be a big yielder of milk, but great care must be taken lest it turn into true mammitis or garget. To prevent undue congestion and the likelihood of blood in the milk at calving time feed a light laxative ration, keep the bowels active and make the heifer take active outdoor exercise every day.

The bleeding when profuse may be stopped by giving the heifer or cow one dram of dried sulphate of iron and three of salt in her feed once daily, and twice daily if not quickly effective. Also bathe the udder three times a day with equal quantities of cold water and cider vinegar, provided the animal is kept in a box-stall and well blanketed against cold and drafts. After each bathing rub in some warm melted, unsalted lard or sweet oil to protect the udder against chilling. When clots of blood are found in the cream separator or setting utensils the milk from each quarter of the udder of each cow has to be carefully examined at milking time or by setting a separate sample from each cow and each of her quarters. In that way the guilty cow and quarter to blame may be detected and the animal isolated for treatment. Growths in the teats are the usual cause of such bleeding and may be removed if close to the opening of the teat, but if high up it is better to let a calf suck or to dry off the milk secretion. Removal is managed by scraping downwards with a little sharp-edged, cone-shaped instrument made for the purpose. Chronic garget may also cause blood in milk and such milk is unfit for any use so that the cow, being in an incurable condition, should be sold as a "canner cow" to the dealer.

MAMMARY TUMOR.—I have a cow that has a cake in one of her teats, extending all the way up her udder. It appeared after she freshened four months ago and was about the size of a small marble. She gives but little milk from that teat. Can it be cured and is the milk fit to use from the other three? MRS. J. M.

A.—One attack of mammitis (garget) or more has caused formation of a tumor which is incurable. It would be best to dry off the remaining milk in that quarter. As tuberculosis is a possible cause of such a condition, the milk should not be used unless the cow has been tested with tuberculin and proved to be free of the disease.

HOGS THAT EAT CHICKENS.—Is there anything to cure a hog from eating chickens? S. G.

A.—Partially blindfold the chicken-eating hog by hanging the back part of a boot from just above the heel by hog rings from the bases of the ears so that it will cover the eyes but not prevent the animal from seeing its feed. Make it a practice to feed the chickens grain away from the hog lot at the same time the hogs are being fed.

FOUNDER.—I have a horse about 12 years old. When I started working him early last winter he seemed limber but last February he went stiff in his front legs and has hardly been able to walk. Veterinarians told me that he had been chest foundered years ago. P. L.

A.—There is no such disease as "chest founder." Founder or laminitis affects the feet only. The affected horse thrusts his fore feet forward and correspondingly advances his hind ones when starting to walk and goes on his heels. Clip the hair from the hoof-heads of both fore feet and then blister them one at a time with a mixture of two drams each of biniodide of mercury and powdered cantharides and three ounces of lard. Repeat the blister at intervals of two or three weeks until he can go fairly sound. Have him shod with flat, thin-heeled bar shoes put on over dressings of lanolin (sheep's wool fat), oakum and thick leather pads.

FITS.—What was wrong with my heifer calf one year old? I saw her turning around and around. I decided she had pink eye and paid no attention to her. A week later she acted the same, growing worse. She began bawling and getting her breath and frothing at the mouth. She lived about an hour. Is it contagious? MRS. G. C. S.

A.—The fit or convulsion described was in all probability caused by eating moldy corn or corn fodder or other damaged feed. That causes botulism, for which an antitoxin is available as a preventive and remedy. Your veterinarian can learn all about that from a bulletin on the subject published by the Illinois Agricultural Experimnt Station, at Urbana, Ill. The bacillus botulinus in the damaged feed causes the disease. Hemorrhagic septicemia causes similar symptoms and is also preventable by vaccination with a fair degree of success. Avoid feeding corn or fodder that is moldy or spoiled in any way.

CANCER OF EYE.—I have a mare that has a growth in her right eye. It started one year ago, just a red lump on the eyeball, and is slowly growing larger. It waters some and the eyesight is not gone. The left eye is weak. What can I do? R. L. R.

A.—The growth is cancerous and known as fungus hematoidis. When cut out it tends to return worse than ever and implicate the bones of the orbit. The latter condition is termed osteo-sarcoma. If you can employ a graduate veterinarian he should remove the growth and possibly the eye. Menwhile, dust the part twice daily with a mixture equal quantities of finely powdered iodoform, calomel and boric acid.

LAME CALF.—I have a six-months-old calf that seems weak in its hips. If you run up to it or it goes to playing, its legs give way and it falls down. Please advise me what to do. E. T.

A.—The calf appears to have rickets from malnutrition. Give it a dose of castor oil and then feed it well on milk, oats, bran and oilmeal and green stuff or clover or alfalfa hay. Let it run out daily. Mix an ounce of lime-water in each pint of milk or sweet skim-milk fed daily.

ABSCESS: FITS.—I have a mare, eight years old, with foal. She had distemper very bad. Her head was stuffed but she had no discharge. A lump formed in her breast as large as a person's head and is hard. I have done all I could. (2) I have a cat that takes fits, jerks, quivers and mews.

A.—If possible have a qualified veterinarian examine this mare as glanders-farcy possibly is present and it is contagious, incurable and also communicable and fatal to man. It is even more likely, however, that the mare had distemper (strangles) in an irregular form and that an abscess is forming at the part mentioned. Clip off the hair and apply tincture of iodine to the lump every other day. If it softens, open it for liberation of pus. (2) Worms no doubt cause the cat to have fits. Starve the animal for 24 hours and then give one to three grains of santonin, according to age and size, and in two or three hours a dose of castor oil containing five drops of turpentine, if the cat is large. Repeat the treatment in 10 days.

SITFAST.—Will you tell me what to do for a saddle horse that has a lump on its back caused by the saddle? It is hard in the center and very sore, making the horse jerk with pain when it is touched. Please give the name of the disease and a remedy for it in the next issue of COMFORT. C. C. M.

A.—A patch or core of horny skin is present in the center of the sore and constitutes what is called a "sitfast." Cut out the core and then treat as a common wound by wetting two or three times daily with a lotion compound of one ounce of acetate of lead, six drams of sulphate of zinc and one pint of soft water. Label the bottle "poison" and shake it well before use. Do not remove the scab formed by the lotion.

COUGHING CALF.—I have a calf three and one-half months old that coughs as though she had a cold, coughing more in the morning than during the day. Otherwise she seems all right. B. C.

A.—If the calf has been on old grass, lung worms probably cause the cough. If so, a veterinarian should be employed to inject a chloroform mixture into the windpipe, or some good may result from having the calf inhale the fumes from iodine crystals placed on a hot brick in a loose-meshed gunny sack into which the head is held for a few seconds several times daily. Care must be taken not to choke the calf. The cough due to lung worms is croupy and a discharge comes from the nose or mouth and is found, on microscopic examination, to contain eggs or worms. A sucking calf often coughs on account of ulcers in its mouth or throat. These should be scraped clean, swabbed with tincture of iodine and then twice daily with a two per cent. solution of permanganate of potash until healed.

LAMENESS.—I have a mare that is lame in the hips. She is in good condition but cannot trot. She has been this way 16 months. What can be done for her? T. R. G.

A.—We suspect that swamp-fever or pernicious anemia is the cause of the lameness, and that disease is incurable. To find out what is wrong you should, however, take the mare to a qualified veterinarian as a personal examination is necessary for the determination of the seat and cause of mysterious lameness and the prescribing of appropriate treatment. Without making an examination we are unable to assign the exact cause of the trouble.

BONE SPAVIN.—I have a young horse, three years old, that has a bone spavin. Is there a cure for it? MRS. M. D.

A.—The spavin cannot be removed but the lameness can be relieved or remedied by having the hock joint and spavin line-fired and blistered by a veterinarian. Then tie the horse up short in a narrow stall so that he will be unable to lie down. He will soon learn to sleep in the standing position, or may be supported with veterinary slings. Have a qualified veterinarian do the firing. The operation is more likely to succeed in an adult horse than in a growing colt, so may have to be repeated later in the case in question.

MAMMITIS.—My cow gives lumpy milk from one of her teats and one side of her udder is hard when I am through milking her. Is there any cure? MRS. A. A. W.

A.—The affected quarter is incurably diseased with mammitis, commonly called garget or caked bag. It would be best to let a calf nurse or to dry off the milk secretion in the sound quarters and then fit the cow for the butcher. Meanwhile isolate the cow, strip the diseased quarter dry every two hours and destroy the milk. Once daily rub into that quarter a mixture of equal quantities of carbolized oil, camphorated oil and compound soap liniment.

RHEUMATISM.—My mule is crippled in right fore leg and can hardly get her head down to eat and drink, and when down can hardly raise it up. She seems to be falling away in right shoulder. G. S.

A.—The symptoms suggest rheumatism but that is a comparatively rare disease in a mule or a horse. Without making an examination we cannot be sure just what is wrong. If you cannot have a qualified veterinarian examine the animal and prescribe appropriate treatment, try the effect of two drams of salol or salicylate of soda given twice daily in the food.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not relating to the special departments elsewhere in the paper, will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address but we will print only initials if so requested.

MRS. W. H., Lehi, Utah.—The "city of salt," to which your inquiry refers, is the famous big salt mine at Wieliczka, Austria. This mine was opened in 1608 and is yet the greatest salt mine in the world. It is almost a thousand feet in depth and extends 300 feet below sea level. There are some twenty-five miles of railroad in the mine, and these tracks center at a great central station which is carved entirely out of salt. In prosperous monarchial times in Austria, many regal fetes have been held in the mine—these taking place in an enormous ballroom where the glittering salt crystals made a marvelous appearance in the glow of lights. There are some 1200 men ordinarily employed in these immense salt mines, laboring to fill a part of the world's need for this important mineral.

R. M., Coldwater, Mich.—The home of Luther Burbank, popularly known as "the plant wizard," is at Santa Rosa, California, where you may address him.

ELLA A., Minnesota.—If you want to know just how many copies of your song this firm would publish for the sum you mention, it is they you should ask and not this department. We would be entirely in ignorance of your correspondence with them or of the terms of such contract as they offer you. Necessarily no company will write music, and furnish paper, composition and printing without being paid some sum for so doing. As an unknown song writer, it is you who must take the risk of publishing your efforts, and you cannot expect any business firm to deal with you on any other basis. Other COMFORT readers, take notice.

D. A. V., Pritchardville, S. C.—The present method by which the date of Easter is determined was not arrived at without some difficulty and controversy. In the second century there was a lively dispute between the Eastern and Western churches. The Eastern church had been celebrating the festival on the 14th day of the first Jewish month and regarded the date as that of the Jewish Passover. The Western church celebrated on the Sunday after the 14th day and considered the date as commemorating the resurrection of Jesus. In 325 A. D., the Council of Nicæa gave a decision in favor of the Western church. But this only settled one part of the difficulty. At the adoption of the Gregorian Calendar in 1582, it was necessary to decide if the date was to remain fixed or movable. It was finally ruled to adhere to a determination by a sort of ecclesiastical moon and not an astronomical one. By this ruling, Easter is always the first Sunday after the Paschal full moon—that is, the full moon which happens upon or next after March 21. If this full moon falls upon a Sunday, Easter Day becomes the Sunday after. By this arrangement Easter can never occur earlier than the 22d of March or later than the 25th of April. In our present century the latest Easter will fall upon the 25th of April in the year 1943.

A. B. J., Bellevue, Idaho.—We would be unable to grant space here to the details of Federal laws relating to homesteads and grazing lands. Send your inquiry to the Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C., or address the Register of the U. S. Land Office, Boise, Idaho.

M. W., Paden, Miss.—The various wedding anniversaries are regarded as follows: First, Cotton; Second, Paper; Third, Leather; Fifth, Wooden; Seventh, Woolen; Tenth, Tin; Twelfth, Silk and fine linen; Fifteenth, Crystal; Twentieth, China; Twenty-fifth, Silver; Thirtieth, Pearl; Fortieth, Ruby; Fiftieth, Golden, Seventy-fifth, Diamond.

MRS. H. H. P., Odem, Tex.—The following solution is one recommended to remove hair from beef and other large hides. Slack twenty pounds of lime in eight gallons of water until thoroughly dissolved. In another vessel dissolve ten ounces of sulphate of iron in two gallons of water. Mix the two solutions thoroughly together and add twenty-five more gallons of water. Let hides remain in this solution from one to sixteen days—length of time depending upon the freshness and strength of the solution. Then remove, scrape off all remaining hair and rinse hide thoroughly in clear water.

Comfort's League of Cousins

I live beside an exquisite lake where the tourists are plentiful during the fishing season. Also it is a wonderful place to go swimming in the summer time.

I am going to embroider a sofa pillow representing "C. L. O. C." I have enlarged my League button on a large sheet of drawing paper and drawn a white dove carrying the button in its beak—this to represent peace.

I would like to hear from all the cousins and I guarantee satisfaction, or money refunded. Ahem!

I will now inform you how I look: I am five feet, two inches tall, weigh 135 pounds. I have chestnut brown hair, and dark playful eyes which are very snappy when my warlike nature is aroused—otherwise I am kind and gentle.

Well, I think it is high time I came up for air, and I will cease, Uncle, with the expectation of hearing in answer from you and the cousins. Give my kind regards to Billy. With love and best wishes to you and the cousins, I am

Your niece, PHOEBE L. BELLAMY.

Phoebe, you seem to be a very cheerful little clamdigger—dwelling along the shores of Spencer Lake where exquisite clams and inquisitive tourists are so plentiful. I have often taken a hand at digging clams, Phoebe, and I can swing a clam hook in an amateurish manner, but I have never fished for tourists. This must be great sport. Do you use bait or a fly? I have heard somewhere that a railroad folder, well illustrated, works successfully, particularly when used on a good line. I'm glad you have so many tourists during the open season, Phoebe, and I hope you get your share of the catch. The slim blond kind of tourist is plentiful and is said to offer good sport, but the dark, sleek-headed species is the most gamey. Be sure you have a landing net handy, Phoebe, when you go out after this last sort. They must be well hooked and played with a steady hand.

I think your sofa-pillow idea is a good one, Phoebe Bell, and you will be setting many of the cousins to work, I'll bet, after they have read your plan of operation. I like your design of peace. A sofa pillow is always a peaceful thing to have around. About half a dozen of 'em well arranged on a soft couch or hammock in a quiet shady spot makes almost the peacefulest thing I know. Bill has a League pillow, too, Phoebe, only his is a piece one. It is stuffed with the pieces of letters he has failed to utilize in his usual toothsome manner.

I shall think of you as swimming around in Spencer Lake and coming up for air, now and then, and snapping your dark, playful eyes. You are a lucky Phoebe bird—or should I say Phoebe-fish?

Bill returns your kind message and says he prefers his clams steamed—and served in the proportion of two quarts of melted butter to each peck of clams.

RANDOLPH, TEXAS.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

This is my first time to write, and therefore I have to stay a long time to tell you all I know. Now I am in the eighth grade and will graduate in two more years. I walk one mile to school.

Well, I will describe myself: I am five feet, four inches tall, weigh 110 pounds, and am fourteen years old. I live on a farm of 81 acres. We have three mules, two mares, a Ford car, three cats and a black dog. As I like everybody always to know my pets' names, here they are: First, the mules are Kit, Toby and Gin. The mares are May and Dais. The cats are Yellowery, Spotetdy and Greyery, and last of all my dog's name is West. Now if you can beat those for names you are a pretty good namer.

As I have not told you what we raise, here goes: We raise cotton, about enough corn to do us, and a little garden. Oh, I haven't told you about what kind of land we've got. It is black, and as sticky as you want it to be when it is muddy.

Sometimes I go hunting on Saturdays with old West. There are lots of rabbits down here. I would like to hear from any of the cousins who live on a ranch—or anywhere else.

There are only four in our family—my mother father, one brother and I. We have the best player piano in our county and an Edison phonograph. So if you ever get lonesome, any of you, come down and I will make you happy with music.

Your friend, FRANK MCCOY PATTON.

Frank, I'm glad to have you come way up from Texas to tell us all you know and give the list of your Randolph Farm Menagerie. You furnish the names of all the animals except that of your Ford. Surely you have christened this playful little animal, Frank—particularly some day when it has got stuck in the black, sticky mud of your roads. I have heard lots of people, on like occasions, give their kind, patient Fords names mostly made of up blanks, dashes, stars and a few sparks of fire, but I hope you treat your most useful of farm friends better than this and give it a gentler name. That is certainly a striking and descriptive manner you have hit upon to call your cats, Frank. According to this charming system, my Billy might be appropriately named Whiskery, Cussedy or Chewery. Which do you think best? Yet I'm afraid he would be the same old Bill, even if I changed his handle.

You must have good sport on your holiday hunts with old West, Frank. But how about when he starts a rabbit and it scampers east? Does your dog just have to let it travel and he keep on going West? This might be awkward and result in reducing your bag. If you want West to be able to range in all directions, I advise you to change his name to Compass.

If I get lonesome for music, Frank, old boy, I'll remember your kind offer of a free concert. Just now I can hear no less than six phonographs and three player pianos, as well as two handorgans—their harmonies floating in through my open window. So I'm not a bit music-lonesome yet, thank you. And Billy is thinking of buying a saxaphone, anyway.

BRIGHTON, R. R. 2, COLORADO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND EVERY READER:

Say! Haven't we got a dandy leader? And Billy the Goat is sure a joke to this great paper of ours, that comes just at the right hours when we seem to need it most, to it I say, let's give a toast!

I guess you wonder who in thunder is giving you all this bunk, and all this junk. Well, I'm five feet, three; fourteen years old I be. My complexion is fair. Light brown is my hair.

I thought I read that somebody in this paper said that America has no pretty girls, and that everything is artificial, even curls. Bah! he ought to come out here in the west, and stay a month as my guest. I bet I could change his mind and many a pretty girl for him find.

I live on a farm of eighty acres. We always raise pickles and tomatoes. So, Uncle, if you like to work a hoe, just come out here and never skip a row.

I would like to hear from cousins far or near. I will answer all, so now will end my call.

From your niece, EBBA LARSON.

Say, Ebba, every word you wrote was read twice over by Billy the Goat, and when he had scanned it a second time, said he: 'Why, Uncle, this letter's in rhyme! Shall I hand it over to you to read—or make it a part of my daily feed?"

And looking I saw that Billy was right—for he can tell the "potes" at sight; and much of "pottery" and many a "pome" has found in Billy a last long home. And everything that resembles verse, Bill christens "piffle"—or something worse!

Yet, Ebba, although you had given cause to land your missive in Billy's jaws, I gave it refuge, because you tried within your letter the rhymes to hide. And as Billy and many a critic knows, there's much of "pottery" that's really prose!

CARRIZOZO, NEW MEXICO.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

Good morning! Yes, it is I, Teddy Carmichael. I came this morning to see if you are as handy at helping a fellow out of trouble as you are at helping him into it! All right, then; come on: I want you to tell the COMFORT readers for me (those that wrote me) that the hame is busted, the gear is stripped and the bearings are burned out. Ha, ha! You tell 'em, Uncle, that the hame broke long ago. To date I have received two thousand, three hundred letters, and a big batch of postcards from COMFORT cousins—and they are still coming. I only go to town twice a week, and last Saturday when I went to the post-office there were seven hundred and forty letters there for me. I know this may sound like a yarn, but I assure you it's the truth. Oh, yes; I understand now about "fools rushing in where angels fear to tread"—but when I wrote that I would answer all that wrote me, I did not realize what I was doing. In fact, I didn't think anything about it much at all. And, Uncle Lisha, here is where you come in. You knew just what you were letting me in for, and if I have to answer all these letters I think you ought to have to help do it. Yes, and I can just see that pesky Goat grinning all over his head. Of course, he, too, knew what I was jumping into. Oh, well; maybe I will get even with Billy yet.

Now, boys and girls and everybody who has written me—I want to thank each and all of you for the good, cheerful and interesting letters you sent. And I want you all to know that I am more disappointed at not being able to answer each one of your letters than you can be in not getting a letter from me. But I am sure you all can see that it is more than one man's job to answer all those letters. Many of those that wrote sent stamps, and many sent snapshots. To all those I am going to do my level best to answer. To the girls, I will say that I am an American. Many thought I was a Mexican. I am not married—and another thing, I most emphatically do not agree with Cousin Jack Wilcox in his opinion of our girls.

And to the many boys that wrote about work out here, I have to say that times are very dull and that there is no work for those men that are here now. I am very sorry to disappoint anyone, but it is best to tell the truth.

Well, Uncle, please rush this by that pesky Goat—so the cousins may know that I am not willfully neglecting to answer their letters.

Your sincere nephew, THEO CARMICHAEL.

P. S. Uncle, I never knew there were so many Juliets in the world.

Well, Teddy, old scout, here is the delayed and sad news of your hame-busted, gear-stripped condition for the cousins to read. And if ever a Goat chuckled so that his whiskers just rippled with mirth, it was Billy when he perused your letter Even I had to grin, although I felt it was my duty to nurse an air of sympathy for your fate. Of course Bill and I knew what you were stirring up and what sort of an avalanche of note paper was on its way to bury your happy valley and Box 146, Carrizozo, New Mexico. I can imagine the flood of paper blowing up and down the canyons, swirling in eddies and sweeping up toward the peak of the Jicarillas. And perhaps not a Goat in sight! Teddy, no six-foot, curly-headed Romeo can go around advertising his lonely condition without arousing sympathetic interest in the hearts and pens of various Juliets. You have discovered this fact with a vengeance—and at the price of much busted harness! You went rushing in all right, Teddy, with your letter in January COMFORT, and if the trace chains didn't hold, you have only those curls to blame. You'll sure have to cut 'em off now, or the Carrizozo postmaster will be demanding more box rent of you, and more salary of Washington. Curls are dangerous things, Teddy, and a bald-headed Romeo will be certain to have less of appeal and correspondence. So get out your safety-razor, Ted, before the seven hundred letters a week increase to seven thousand!

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for June

"Inasmuch as you have done it unto the least of these you have done it unto Me."

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Every month brings to me letters which disregard this simple and necessary rule. Appeals unaccompanied by the references required will be destroyed.

Doc Willoughby, Scottsville, Ky. Here is a boy who has never walked a step in his life. He asks for cheery letters and post-cards to help pass shut-in hours. Lawrence M. Bird, Dalton, R. R. 6, Ga. This appeal is from a man who for thirty years has been a helpless paralytic as the result of a spinal injury in childhood. Well recommended. All his aid must come from others. Don't disappoint him. Princie Greene, Yuma, N. C. A girl of twenty-one who has been blind from birth. Give her a dime shower. Mrs. Zade Bailey, Allensprings, Ky. An old lady of 71 who would be grateful for letters and post-cards to make her shut-in days more bearable. Mrs. M. R. Culver, Roxbury, R. R. Box 36, Vt. Asks for letters, quilt pieces, or anything that would "please an old lady." It should be easy to give happiness to this poor soul. Luther Eslinger, Cosby, Tenn., sends thanks to all who have written him so many cheerful letters and sent him periodicals and other aid.

June is a month of love and gladness if ever there was one. Think of being housed up for not only one June but for many such glorious months. Remembering this, give such cheer and financial aid as you can that may bring a little of the shut-out June gladness to the June shut-ins listed this month. Open your hearts. Cousins, in the same way the roses are opening theirs this first month of summer.

Lovingly,

Uncle Lisha

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C." a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, but after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

How to become a Member

Send fifty-five cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Wheel Chairs in May

COMFORT'S Total to Date

ree May wheel chairs go to aster, R. R. 1, Scammon, Kan- Russell Cochran, Box 881, . Mont., 150; Vertice Borders, leflin, Ala., 52. The figures fol-heir respective names indicate ber of subscriptions sent in by by their friends for them. Laster, age 9, received a severe his spine last July by falling from a large tree. As a result of this injury he is a cripple and since the accident has been unable to walk.

Russell Cochran, age 5, has been an invalid from birth and never able to walk. He has about the same use of his legs as a five-months-old baby. The doctors differ in opinion as to the cause of his trouble; some say it is due to pressure on the brain while others claim that the brain has nothing to do with his condition. The physician who is treating him now thinks he may get better in time.

Vertice Borders, age 15, has been a cripple all his life and never able to walk. The cause of his deplorable condition is unknown. The COMFORT wheel chair that I am sending this unfortunate boy will be a source of joy to him and a help to his folks in caring for him.

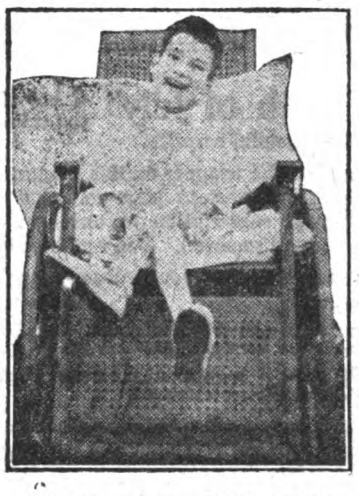
All three recipients of our May wheel chairs happen to be children. To be crippled at any age is bad enough, but for such an affliction to befall one in early youth and deprive the victim of all the joys of active childhood seems especially cruel and pitiable.

You have helped to provide the means whereby these three young shut-ins will be enabled to get out and enjoy the spring air and sunshine, but remember that on our waiting list are many other shut-ins, including all ages, who are in need of COMFORT wheel chairs. Be liberal in helping them this present month.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT,

Publisher of COMFORT.



P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscriptions, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Little Boy Growing up in His COMFORT Wheel Chair

Summerfield, N. C.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I enclose a picture of my little boy Herbert Everett Walker in his COMFORT wheel chair which you were kind enough to send him five years ago. Since then I have tried so many times to get a good picture of him in the chair and this is the first good one that I have succeeded in getting. I hope you will print it in COMFORT so that all may see how he enjoys it. I wish on this occasion again to thank you and all the friends who helped him to get his chair.

Sincerely yours,

(Mrs.) S. W. Walker.

Goat Meat Sells as Lamb or Mutton

Goat meat is seldom found on the mar- ket as such, yet the average number of goats slaughtered each year from 1916 to 1920, inclusive, was 141,487. It is probable that most of this meat reaches the con- sumer as mutton, which it resembles closely, as there are few cities that re- quire it to be marketed under its own name. In cities and towns adjacent to the range country, however, Angora wethers are freely marketed as such and the meat is consumed without discrim- ination by the buyer. When received in large numbers these wethers usually sell at about 60 per cent. of the price paid for sheep wethers.

The reduced price of goat meat is doubtless attractive to the consumer, whether he knows what he is getting or thinks he is buying mutton. According to Farmers' Bulletin 1203, "The Angora Goat," recently issued by the United States Department of Agriculture, goat meat is usually superior to mutton that can be bought at the same price. Some consumers say that they are able to dis- tinguish it from lamb and mutton by a characteristic sweetness.

Cubby Bear and the Chickens

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

CUBBY Bear, taking a pleasant stroll one bright June morning, came upon Robbie Reddie, his sweet-voiced robin friend, who greeted him joyously.

"Come with me to the pasture, Cubby Bear," he said, "and see what I have found hidden under some raspberry bushes!"

It was a nest which Robbie showed Cubby, and in the nest beautiful, large white eggs.

"Oh! what a lot of them!" said Cubby, and counted—"twelve! Whose eggs are they?"

"Mrs. Hen's. She has 'stolen' her nest up here, instead of using the one they made for her in the poultry-house."

"Qua-awk—cut-cut-cut—qu-a-awk!"

Cubby looked up at the sound, and there was Mrs. Hen, a little way off, dancing about in a rage, with all her feathers rumpled.

"You better go away, out of sight, Cubby Bear," advised Robbie Reddie, "while I talk to her. She is afraid of you."

Robbie Reddie soothed the angry, frightened Mrs. Hen, telling her that Cubby Bear would never harm her or her eggs, and soon he called Cubby to come and be introduced.

"It would be better if I had stayed at home!" lamented Mrs. Hen. "I am afraid to leave my eggs here while I go for food and water."

Cubby and Robbie offered to watch the eggs for her a while every day. She gladly agreed, and every morning they went to the nest beneath the raspberry bushes, never once forgetting.

One morning, as Cubby Bear and Robbie Reddie approached the hidden nest, they heard a gentle clucking. They found Mrs. Hen stirring uneasily, her feathers fluffed out, her small eyes glowing with eagerness.

"I do not need you this morning," she told them. "My chickens are hatching, and I cannot leave them. Listen!"

They heard a faint little "Peep, peep!"

"One already is out—a fine, strong chick," said Mrs. Hen proudly, "and others are breaking their shells. Leave me, please! By tomorrow afternoon they will all be hatched, and then you may come and see them."

At noon the next day Robbie Reddie came to Mamma Bruin's house, quite trembling with excitement, and calling,

"Cubby Bear! oh, come quick! Run to the pasture! Don't stop to ask questions—I will tell you as we go!"

Cubby started, running, and Robbie Reddie flew at his side.

"Oh, oh!" interrupted Cubby; "have you seen them? Why didn't you wait for me?"

"No, I have not seen them. I was telling Mrs. Hen to hurry back to her nest, for I could see the farmer's boy coming up over the pasture hill, and with him Rover Dog. Well, who should be waiting for Mrs. Hen, hiding behind a big rock, but Foxy Reynard! I had not seen him. He made a dash for her——"

"Oh, oh! did he catch her?"

"Yes. I was glad she was not near her nest, for I did not want Foxy to catch her little new chickens."

"Did Mrs. Hen get away?"

"She made the most awful squaking! Of course the boy and Rover Dog heard the noise, and came running to help her. Foxy dropped Mrs. Hen and ran off into the forest."

Cubby Bear stopped running, and stood still, panting, for he was out of breath from hurrying.

"Well, but if Mrs. Hen is safe, and Foxy gone, why need we run so fast? What is there to be done about it now?"

"Why, this," explained Robbie Reddie. "After a long chase, all over the pasture, the boy and Rover Dog caught poor Mrs. Hen, and the boy carried her off to the barn, though I must say she pecked at his hands bravely. But, don't you see, the baby chicks have no one to take care of them?"

Cubby began to run again.

"If Foxy should come back and find them—oh, fly ahead, Robbie Reddie, and see if they are safe! I will be there as soon as I can."

They found the baby chickens safe, but "peeping" hungrily.

"Oh, such cunning little dears!" cried Cubby.

There were twelve of them, fluffy little balls of down, two black and ten yellow.

Robbie Reddie was amazed at sight of them.

"Why, why!" he exclaimed. "I never expected them to be so pretty! I have seen baby robins, and they are bare little creatures, with no feathers. Of course grown-up robins are much nicer than grown-up hens—hens cannot sing at all, and are no good at flying—but I must confess that, as babies, the chicks are far handsomer than little robins."

Cubby bent over the tiny things in rapture, touching them gently.

CUBBY, RACKY AND ROBBIE TOOK THE CHICKS FOR A WALK THROUGH THE PLEASANT FOREST.

"Poor things!" said Robbie Reddie. "You and I could bring food for them, but they need their mother to keep them warm and care for them."

"I know!" decided Cubby. "I will take them home with me, and keep them. You may help, too!"

"But how will you get them home?" asked the robin.

"You stay and watch them, while I hurry back and borrow the Bunny Babies' cart!"

The twelve little chicks were safely moved to Mamma Bruin's house, and for the next three weeks Cubby could hardly think of anything but his little pets. All day he watched and fed and tended them. His friends complained that he would never share their games.

One day he was playing with the chickens in the house.

"Oh, take them out!" Mamma Bruin told him. "I can hardly move for fear of walking on them."

"It is a hot day," said Cubby anxiously; "I would not want them to get a sunstroke!" But he took them out, as he was told, keeping them in the shade.

"I know what I can do," he said to Robbie Reddie. "I will get Racky Coon to help me make them some little hats, to keep the sun off their heads."

Robbie flew away to find Racky Coon, who kindly came, willing to help.

"We will get some white birch-bark," said Racky. "That will make some pretty hats!"

Bunny Rabbit took care of the chickens for the afternoon.

Cubby and Racky, with Robbie Reddie's help, got together a good supply of smooth birch-bark, and searched until they found some pretty gray lichens with bright red dots, to be used for trimming.

Twelve dainty little round hats were fashioned from the birch-bark, to fit the twelve downy little heads, each one with a wreath of the red-dotted lichen.

Then Cubby and Racky tried them on the chickens, while Robbie Reddie stood watching.

The new hats were becoming, but disappointing; for every time a chicken moved his head, off fell a hat.

"They must have straps under their chins, to hold them on," said Cubby, as he picked up the tenth hat that fell. "You know Billy Bluejay wears a black cap-strap."

They pulled off thin little soft strips of the white birch-bark to make the chin-straps, and added a further touch of beauty to the hats by making streamers to hang down behind.

Cubby stood lost in admiration, watching his little flock, when at last the hats were securely fastened on.

Cubby, Racky and Robbie took the chicks for a walk through the Pleasant Forest, and proudly showed them to everyone they met.

"Too bad Mrs. Hen doesn't know they are safe," remarked Bunny Rabbit. "If I had been carried away from my Baby Bunnies, I could never rest or be happy not knowing what had become of them!"

Cubby and Robbie Reddie looked at each other. Why had they never thought of this before? Poor Mrs. Hen!

"I'll go straight to the farm," said Robbie Reddie, "and if I can see Mrs. Hen I'll tell her her babies are all safe and happy."

When he came back from the farm Robbie Reddie said:

"Poor thing! she was in one corner of the poultry-yard, all humped up, looking sad and lonely. She was glad to hear about her children, but of course she wants them herself."

"Oh, dear, oh, dear!" sighed Cubby Bear. He knew he ought to give the chickens back to their mother, but how could he—the little things he loved so much?

"You must go back to Mrs. Hen," he said to Robbie Reddie after thinking for a few moments, "and tell her to be in the poultry-yard after dark tonight, if she wants a beautiful surprise."

Cubby gave the chicks their supper and put them to bed early, then, after dark, woke them.

His eyes dim with tears, he brushed their little fluffy coats and fastened on, for the last time, the twelve little birch-bark hats.

When they reached the poultry-yard Mrs. Hen was watching for them. Shinyblack Crow, who had gone with them, took one chick at a time in his strong bill, and flying over the high fence, restored them to their mother.

Cubby wept on the way home, but Shinyblack Crow said:

"Cheer up, Cubby Bear! the chickens would not be so cunning much longer. Soon they would lose their soft down, and be long-legged creatures with bare skin showing through ragged, growing feathers. And you know very well Mamma Bruin would not want a dozen hens filling her house. They will be better off in the poultry-house, for they will not be able to look out for themselves in winter, like us, who live in the forest."

Next morning Shinyblack Crow came to Cubby, saying:

"I have been to the farm. Oh, it was the funniest sight—I have been laughing ever since! There was Mrs. Hen, proudly leading her chicks around the yard, when the farmer came out. He just stood and stared at them with his mouth open. Then he called to Mrs. Farmer and the children, and when they came out, there were more staring eyes and open mouths.

"Well, it was a most surprising sight for them—twelve three-weeks-old chickens appearing there just over night, where there had been no chickens before; and all of them wearing hats! Do not worry about your chick-a-bids, Cubby Bear. They'll be better taken care of than any fowls the farmer ever had before, I can promise you!"

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

Systematic Movement to Correct Physical Defects and Improve the Health of Farm Children

FOR many years the welfare and health of the children in our large cities and especially of those in the crowded tenement sections have been receiving an ever increasing share of public attention and bounty with the result that they now are being solicitously cared for at school and at home by health officers, school boards, teachers of hygiene, district nurses and agents of social service and other charitable associations The children and their parents are given health instruction; school lunches are served free or at a nominal price; playgrounds and recreation parks are maintained at public expense; fresh air and vacation funds provide picnics, a day's outing in the country, at the seashore, the lakeside or on the water, and even vacations of a week or more on farms. All this is, of course, as it should be, for the benefit of city children who manifestly need such help.

But how about the country children? The care of their health and welfare until very recently has been entirely, and for the most part still is left to the discretion and resources of their parents, apparently on the assumption that, because of the healthfulness of their living conditions, Nature can be relied on to do the rest. How falacious this assumption is, even as applied to progressive and well-to-do rural communities, was lately brought to light in a convincing manner by the report of a physical examination of all the school children in a Kansas county which in enlightenment and prosperity fairly represents that State and probably exceeds the average for the Nation. It appears by this test that, although the farm children average considerably better than city children in health and physical development, the percentage of undernourished, diseased and physically defective among the former is surprisingly large; so large as to demand public attention and remedial action The disclosure came about in the manner and with the results which are briefly summarized as follows:

One of the local Red Cross chapters in Kansas with its left-over war funds established a public nursing station, and the nurse in charge, accompanied and assisted by a doctor and a dentist, examined every child in 123 country and town schools and sent the parents reports of the condition and hygienic needs of their offspring. Charles Moreau Harger, in a recent article in The Outlook (New York), thus epitomizes the result of this health survey: "The examiners made records of 3,632 children, and they found that 2,317 were defective—over 63 per cent. Of the defectives 836 were underweight, with other defects, and 1,237 were suffering from malnutrition. That is, one-third of the children of this community were undernourished. When the larger towns were eliminated, one with many Mexican children, the percentage of malnutrition showed a decrease, but the rural districts alone had over one-fifth of their children thus affected. Only 878 children (24 per cent.) were normal and without physical defect."

At the outset the examiners encountered opposition and resentful criticism by the country people for meddlesomeness in needlessly, as was generally believed, extending the investigation to include children reared on the farms amid sunshine, fresh air and green fields, and provided with an abundance of food—natural conditions ideal for child life; but these same people for the most part had the good sense and candor to change their opinion when informed of the actual facts relative to the health of their children. Of this Mr. Harger writes:

"The survey startled the county, and things began to happen. One result was an indignant protest from some parents who declared that they would see their own physician about it—which was exactly what the nurse wanted. She had the figures to show that this was badly needed, for there were reported 216 cases (7 per cent.) of defective vision; 23 cases (1 per cent.) of defective hearing; 125 cases (4 per cent.) of adenoids; 819 cases (28 per cent.) of defective tonsils; 1,071 cases (37 per cent.) of defective teeth. What could be better than that the home physician and dentist should get busy? * * * *

"That it paid was demonstrated when the latest re-examination was made and it was found that these defects had been corrected; eyes, 99; adenoids, 109; tonsils, 215; teeth, 440. More care has been given to the children of the county in the past year than ever [before] in its history—which was precisely the object of the movement."

Although efforts varying in effectiveness for the physical betterment of children are being made in other rural communities, the survey in the Kansas instance, which we have cited, was so thorough and systematic, and so largely productive of beneficial results that the lesson which it teaches is of inestimable importance in two respects: first, because the exact data which it furnishes show the necessity for a general and systematic movement to improve the health and remedy the physical defects of children throughout the country, even in the best rural sections, and, second, because it demonstrates what can be accomplished by such an undertaking and just how to go about it. It is to be hoped, also, that it will be given nation-wide publicity and thereby serve as a means of promoting the cause of rural child welfare which is beginning to attract public attention.

The root of the trouble with the health of farm children is the unconscious neglect by the parents of those small ailments and defects in their offspring which escape notice or are thought to be of a trivial nature but in the course of time, if not remedied, grow to be serious and permanent infirmities. These parents are not blamable for their lack of medical knowledge. The remedy consists in authoritatively bringing the children's defects to the attention of their parents of whom a large majority undoubtedly would, as in the Kansas county, take prompt action to have them corrected. For the most part the problem resolves itself into the simple matter of periodical examinations of the children and advice to the parents; but in addition to this clinics should be maintained at public expense for the free treatment of defective children whose parents are unable to pay for the required medical or surgical service.

Let Our Independence Day Resolve Be to Clean Up America

DOUBTLESS the coming Fourth of July will be celebrated generally as a gala-day featured with festivities so long customary as to have lost much of their original significance and ceased to be profoundly impressive; and even where the program includes an oration the latter probably will consist of the usual spread-eagle harangue, designed to flatter our national vanity and tickle the ears of a pleasure-seeking throng, rather than a rational discourse on the present-day calls of patriotism. There is need that a larger element of seriousness be infused into our observance of Independence Day, and it behooves patriotic citizens on the coming anniversary, instead of boasting our greatness and triumphs, rather to take note of the civic virtues that made us a great people, and to search out and examine our national weaknesses and faults that menace our present and cloud our future.

The Fourth-of-July orators delight in gloryfying the well-known prowess of our soldiers and the victories of our army and navy in battle with foreign foes, which within reasonable bounds is a fitting tribute to the valor of our troops and properly gratifying to our pride. But their eloquence would be of greater service by going a step further and pointing out the more dangerous enemies in our midst whose insidious activities disturb the peace, harrass the community, jeopardize life and property and are subversive of law and good government. It is against these internal forces of destruction that the people should be warned and urged to do their utmost to combat them. A wave of crime has spread over the land and is rampant in all our large cities to the extent that murders and robberies are of almost daily occurrence by day as well as by night in the principal business streets. In several cities the terror of this outbreak of lawlessness has reached almost panic proportions; the detective and police forces have been largely augmented, and the authorities with the active support of citizen law and order organizations have inaugurated drastic measures for the suppression of crime and the detection and punishment of the perpetrators.

At the present writing (June first) Chicago is the storm center and has been through the past month during which, in addition to the alarming frequency of hold-ups, burglaries and other crimes of violence already obtaining, the murders, assaults, riots, incendiary fires and blowing up of buildings perpetrated in connection with the strike of the building trades unions caused an actual reign of terror of such magnitude that the Chief of Police, a Chicago judge and the Chicago Tribune call it "war by an organized group of criminals against law and order." It is asserted by the law officers and the Citizens' Committee that these crimes were incited by the leaders of the strike, 150 of whom were arrested therefor in one day's raid, among them the presidents of three labor unions who are indicted for murder.

As proof that this terrible deluge of crime was instigated by the strike leaders for the purpose of gaining their ends by frightfulness the Chief of Police cites the significant fact that immediately following their arrest robberies, burglaries and other crimes dropped to a figure that the Police Department could successfully cope with But he emphatically declared that "The war in which the Chicago Police Department is engaged today is not a war upon organized labor It is a war upon hired assassins, paid vandals and unscrupulous blackmailers." And he explains that "For several years past a gang of professional thugs have gradually gained executive control of a number of Chicago labor unions. Through intimidation and violence they have worked their way into the inner councils of certain unions until they have become absolute dictators of the terms on which a man may work, for whom he may work, when and where. This grip is so tight that by systematic blackmail of workers and their employers alike they have accumulated large sums of money, which they have used in bribery and corruption on a scale so enormous that they have been almost immune from successful prosecution."

Because of the intolerable corruption and tyranny of these union labor bosses, building operations were nearing a standstill in Chicago. At this juncture the labor unions and the employers by mutual agreement submitted all their differences as to wages and working conditions to former Judge K. M. Landis. He rendered a decision which was approved by the public and accepted by the employers and by a majority of the workers, but was objected to by these union bosses because it deprived them of their precious opportunity for graft, and therefore they ordered a strike, and attempted to carry it through by intimidating both workers and employers. As the Philadelphia Evening Public Ledger comments: "The labor unions need to clean house if they do not wish to be destroyed by a small minority of traitors in their ranks." Not only the labor unions but the entire nation needs to clean house; and this is a job in which the people as well as their law-makers, judges and other public officials must take a hand. The prevailing tendency of the past quarter of a century to make it easy for criminals must be reversed. Public opinion should be led to demand more stringent laws and severer penalties, less leniency by judges in sentencing and fewer pardons.

A DISTANCE--MUFFLED boom roused Vale Chatsworth from sleep. Stirring lazily, he reached under his pillow for his watch and glanced at the time. It was five-thirty.

"Early enough," he yawned, "but then, better to get well out of the city before the youngsters start their Fourth of July celebrating."

Then suddenly galvanized into life, he sprang up, stripped and jumped beneath his shower, after which he clad himself in summer flannels, crush hat and threw a linen duster over his arm.

Then he stole cautiously from his room and to the garage.

But his sister was waiting for him. Clad in an extravagant silk kimono, her hair tastefully arranged, she sat beneath a giant elm tree which towered over the garage.

She regarded him with a stern, disapproving look.

"I've caught you, you see! So you really meant all you said last night! Where is your gallantry? Where is your consideration for me?"

"Now, Tessie, what's the use of starting all over? I purposely tried to get out early so that we wouldn't have another row over the matter. You must excuse me to Virginia Tremont. Tell her I'm in jail for speeding, and then I can avoid her the whole time she is here, for I positively refuse to play escort to her. If she were a pretty, silky, feminine sort of a girl who'd faint into my arms at the sight of a mouse and then regard me as a hero, possibly I wouldn't mind, but from her letters in which she tells of her escapades, she's too independent a person to suit me."

"But she is beautiful, and sweet and spirituelle and all that, Vale. I've told you that, many times."

"Too independent," returned Chatsworth. "Remember the time she was robbed when in New York and instead of telegraphing home for money, she went to work as a stenographer! And, again, the time she went out West with several shop girls, unchaperoned, and lived like them—and—well, you know her style. That's too independent for me. Should I marry her, as you've indicated you'd like to have me do, she might coolly leave my house and set out to earn her own living if I didn't toe the mark."

"Would you have us slaves to you?" demanded his sister. "This is a free and independent country—we even set aside a day to celebrate our independence—and if you want to be free, isn't it only natural that women should want to be, also?"

"Oh, don't argue that stuff—I'm sick of women's rights. Men and women will never agree on the subject, of course, because a woman cannot understand a man's feelings in that respect. I'm satisfied that you have all the liberty except such liberty that tends to loosen the marriage tie. A man doesn't feel right if he can't feel that he is the sole breadwinner of the family, and while it is all right for a woman to know that she can make her own living, the longer she keeps it to herself, the better. When she takes away from a man the feeling that she is not dependent upon him, he loses that feeling of protection and compassion for her helplessness which are his two strongest emotions—next to love. Virginia Tremont do sn't need a man's protection and consequently needs no gallantry from me. Now, I'm through preaching and I'm going," and with the words, Vale smiled an impudent smile to take away the really serious import he meant his words should have, tossed the motor luncheon set (which he had given orders to the servants to have ready for him) into the machine and with a roar of the engine, he tangoed backward down the drive and bounced into the street and was off.

He smiled, a little bitterly, as he recalled his words. His sister was expecting Miss Virginia Tremont, a college friend, who was to pay her an extended visit. Virginia was something of a tease, adept with her pen and had written many satirical things regarding the species male in the college journal. She probably didn't mean them, being just a young woman, but Chatsworth, being a fellow near thirty and a practicing lawyer, blamed her for these satirical writings—having seen a great deal of unhappiness resulting from too flippant regard for the sanctity of marriage.

Worst of all, however (and this his sister Tessie did not know), he had seen, inadvertently, this mischievous line in a letter which Virginia had written:

"You say that you will insist that your brother, Vale, constitute himself our escort and bodyguard. My dear, don't let these lords of creation think we need their attentions and escort. We can have splendid times just by ourselves."

This was really the cause of his grouchiness, and never having seen a picture of Virginia he decided she must look like a hatchet-faced suffragette.

He wasn't supposed to see this letter, but as Tessie always passed him Virginia's letters to read, he got into the habit of reading them without invitation.

The machine swung through the quiet city streets in the fresh, sweet morning. The cloudless night before had emboldened the householders to decorate their lawns and fling their flags to the breeze, so these flapped with soothing washes, bunting fluttered and Japanese lanterns shimmied on their wires. Occasionally a deep boom came from the distance, now and then the rattle of a discharging revolver, and once or twice he swerved from the path of a cannon-cracker.

"Glad I'll soon be out of this!" he exclaimed once, as one of these giant crackers exploded somewhat too near him.

His ruffled feelings were beginning to subside, and by the time he had reached the open country, his pulse was normal. There were but few cars for most motorists had gone out of the city the night before.

He had no particular objective, except to get away from the house. Being a lover of nature and inclined to celibacy, it was his delight to take the machine and some lunch and start off, turning into byways to find natural thickets which revealed the joys of discovering developing nature—the ripening red raspberries or dwarf blueberries or perhaps the blooming meadow-sweet—for these were now due.

Such a prospect now rose before him. It was a little clearing with a limpid pool in the center of it. At its farther edge lay a tangled thicket that suggested bird life. He made for it, seeking a place to turn off the road. This necessitated rounding a jog, but as he did so, he nearly collided with a powerful touring car that blocked the road.

"For the love of Pete! What a place to park!" he exclaimed as he jammed on his emergency brake.

Not being able to pass the car, he got out to investigate. No one was about, but presently a girl appeared from a thicket, dragging a branch.

She was clad in what might have been the latest thing in a motor costume, but to Vale's eyes it seemed more like a riding habit, for it consisted of a coat the skirts of which came to her knees, and the rest—well, to his eyes she was wearing trousers.

These breeches came in for his disapproval—until he caught sight of her face. Then he realized that she was gloriously beautiful, her tawny, fluffy hair framing a face that had a most tantalizing and piquant expression.

How pretty she looked until—until—oh, those breeches!

They brought back all his disapproval of independent women.

"Will you move your car, please?" he begged, bluntly.

"I can't," she returned.

"In trouble, are you?"

"Yes."

"Alone?"

"Yes."

Then he noted the license plate on the machine was that of another state.

"Another fool woman making a tour by herself," he murmured, with a grin, but she caught it, evidently—her face, at any rate, showed it. "What's the matter? Got enough water? Gas? Oil? Jammed on your emergency brake? Most women's troubles in driving are due to silly little causes like that."

"I'm not asking for your advice," she said haughtily, "and if, unfortunately, I've gotten stalled, it may be a warning to you. Look," and she waved toward the road.

Then he first noted what the trouble was—the road just beyond the jog was the most hacked-up piece it had ever been his misfortune to meet. How the girl had gotten as far as she had was a mystery, but at any event the machine had finally lost out in the struggle and had given up the ghost for it was lying flat upon its axles, its rear wheels in a hopeless bog.

"Didn't you know better than to come over such a road?" he demanded.

"I got lost," she wailed, "and besides you were going to make it."

"Oh, no, I wasn't," he replied loftily, "I wouldn't have attempted it. You women drivers make me tired. You use no judgment."

"Oh, you're one of those men who evidently have no respect for women," she retorted.

"And you, I suppose," he said grimly, though a smile lurked at the corners of his mouth, "are a suffragette."

"Not at all," she replied, turning away.

"Do you want me to help you?"

"I'm not asking you," she returned, without looking at him.

"I see you're not. You're too independent. You got into the mess—I suppose you prefer to work your way out of it. Lords of creation, like myself, are not necessary to women of your type."

At that, she quickly turned and glanced up at him, but his remark evidently was a mere abstract one. She quickly cast down her eyes.

"Well," he said at length, "since you don't need my services, or are too proud to ask for them, I'll offer them anyhow. I'm the old-fashioned sort who believes in helping beauty in distress."

"Do you talk like this to all girls you chance to meet?" she asked.

"Oh, no. This is the first experience of this sort I've ever had in my life," he replied, as he raised the hood of the machine. Then he got into the car and started it. The only result was a tremendous pull on the part of the machine and beautiful swishes of mud flew into the air.

"Well, I'll get you out," he said decidedly, "but it will take some time." As a matter of fact, it would have been the simplest plan to have turned his machine around, gone to the nearest farmhouse (though there was none in sight) and gotten a team and a few men and the job would have been done shortly. But, somehow, there was something quite piquant about the young woman, he liked her retorts, and as he had the whole day before him, he was satisfied to wile the time thus away.

He threw off his duster, took off his collar and tie and rolled up his sleeves. Then he slipped into his coveralls and went to work.

Any motorist who has tried to get his machine out of a mudhole can sympathize with Vale Chatsworth in the job he had undertaken—and the machine was no flivver, either. It was mighty heavy.

Think of the tricks you have tried—of the amazing devices you've picked up by the wayside to help you turn the trick, and you can imagine what Chatsworth's job was.

So he labored on while the sun rose higher and higher until it stood at the zenith.

"You are wasting your time," the girl said regretfully. "What could I have done without you?"

"Don't mind my time; I've the whole day to myself. In fact, I've run away from home, for I don't want to meet a certain person."

"A young lady?"

"Of course."

"Has she a pretty name? A name as pretty as mine?

"What is your name?" he queried.

"It's Imogen."

He made a face at that. That name, Imogen, always conjured up a particularly nasty little girl he had known at school.

"You don't like the name, do you?" she queried.

"No, I don't," he said flatly.

"You talk to girls just as you would to men, don't you?" she continued.

"Sure," he returned. "Gee, I'm getting hungry."

"I'm sorry I haven't anything to give you," she said, "but I didn't expect to be on the road at this time and am not prepared to serve."

"Well, there's a motor luncheon set in my machine and I believe there's enough for two. Suppose you unpack it and serve, that is, if you care to slave for a mere male creature," and a droll smile came to his lips.

"You are a woman-hater, aren't you?" she chided. "I believe you have a shattered romance."

"No, I haven't. And I only hate the women who pretend or really believe they don't need men."

At that, she tossed her head a bit and went to prepare the luncheon. Seeing this, Vale went to the pool and there cleaned up a bit and when he returned, Imogen had the luncheon prepared and passed a plate, very prettily arranged, to him. There was something very womanly in the way she did it, and Vale was beginning to feel a bit ashamed of his boorishness, for many of his really insulting remarks had a target in her, and now, with those odious breeches hidden (for she was seated), there was nothing about her that suggested the suffragette.

"This is a most peculiar Fourth of July, isn't it? No firecrackers nor anything——"

"Do you still play with them?"

"I do have a celebration for the kids of the neighborhood——"

"I thought so!" she interrupted him, "'for the kids of the neighborhood'! Confess it is only to satisfy your own boyish craving for playing with fire."

"I'm afraid I'm playing with fire now," he said gravely.

"Oh!" she exclaimed, and then she had but little to say for a while.

Luncheon was finished in silence, then Vale went back to his job.

"You're wasting the whole day," she said, after he had spent another half hour on the work in hand. "You sure you don't mind?"

"Oh, sure," he replied, and then somehow he found himself telling why he wanted to avoid Virginia Tremont, and much of what he had told his sister, Tessie.

"Do you really think she is that sort of a girl?" Imogen asked.

"I really do."

"Why?"

"Because it was a confession. That girl wrote my sister saying that I needn't bother to escort them about—they could have much nicer times by themselves."

"So your vanity was wounded?"

"A man always wants to feel that the woman he loves thinks him a hero and her best protector."

"You don't believe a woman ought to be independent of man in that respect?"

"No! Never!"

Thus chatting, the work was finally done and the machine brought upon terra firma. But it was a sight.

"I'll wash it for you," Vale volunteered, and Imogen agreed to it.

Considering his limited means for this, the job was wonderful, though when he was finished the afternoon was well spent.

"You may go now," he said. But as he spoke, he was aware of a little pang. Somehow the bright afternoon took on a somber tinge, somehow the birds seemed to have stopped singing and the katydids seemed to chirr mournfully. It seemed as if something beautiful had stepped into his life, only to step out again.

"I don't know what I should have done without you. But as it is late and I suppose you will return to the city—may I not follow you?"

"By all means! Let us drive abreast as long as we may!"

It was blue twilight when the city's outskirts hove into sight, and the traffic was becoming fearfully jammed. They reached the city. In crossing a street, Vale got across, but the traffic policeman held up the girl. Vale did not observe this for the moment, and when he looked about—she had disappeared in the jam of cars.

He pulled to the curb and watched the machines. But all those moving in a forward direction did not reveal the girl.

He had lost her!

Now he realized how dark it was—suppose she shouldn't find her way to her friends? She was but a bit of a girl, and her independence, after all, was more of a showy than a real nature. Witness the sweet way in which she asked if she could follow him into town. And her gratitude was so sincere.

If he could but follow three directions at once! Possibly she might have parked somewhere after he had lost her, hoping he would look for her. So he drove forward a mile or two, thinking perhaps she might have gotten ahead of him. Then he returned and turned to the left and followed that street for a few miles and returned. Then he tried turning to the right. No success.

The traffic cop now noticed him.

"What'che lose—your nut?" he bawled out.

Why hadn't he had sense enough to ask whom she was going to visit!

Well, the only thing was to go home, for it was dark now.

All about the city, wonderful fireworks started to go up. He passed an amusement park—within its confines the great rockets were soaring, the bombs bursting, making day of night.

But he didn't notice these glories. The girl was lost to him—and he should have taken better care of her. But why? Because, forsooth, he had fallen in love with her, and miserably he acknowledged it to himself.

He reached home, called to Sam to come and take the car and then went upstairs.

Stella, the maid, met him when he came down.

"Tessie ordered me to prepare a supper for you, Mr. Vale," she said. "And will you please to go out upon the porch when you've finished—Miss Tremont has arrived and there are other visitors."

"Thanks," he said, and sat down to his lonely supper, but not to eat. For having met and lost the most wonderful little girl in the world, it would be intolerable to listen to a suffragette's claptrap.

He must meet her, however, there was no help for it, and he might just as well be as boorish as possible, thus ending any sociability once and for all, so he stepped out upon the porch, fancifully draped with bunting and flags and softly lit with glowing lanterns.

He looked first for a stranger, though he bowed to all present.

In the porch swing, a sweet, silky bit of femininity swung.

"Virginia, let me present my brother, Vale."

The little figure sat up and into the light.

"Delighted to meet you, Mr. Chatsworth."

"Imogen!"

"If you like that better," she smiled roguishly as, almost unconsciously, she slipped over to a corner of the swing, making room for him to sit down. (Which he did, and it was perfectly proper since there was nowhere else to sit except upon the steps, or the railing of the window-seat—oh, no, there wasn't any place else to sit, truly there wasn't!)

"Why did you give me the slip?" he asked accusingly.

"Because I knew you hated me and you told Tessie to tell me you were in jail for speeding. She followed your instructions, not expecting you home tonight, I suppose."

"I was very much worried and looked for you until I had to give up."

"But you know how independent I am. You knew I didn't need you."

"Possibly, but I found out that I need you," he dared to whisper.

"You two are very chummy for having met just this moment," complained little Johnny Tolliver who thought he had made a hit—until Vale came.

"We met—al fresco—this morning and are but continuing our acquaintance," said Vale smoothly.

Sam came to the porch.

"Mass'a Vale," he began, "de chillum done want to know ef you's gwine er shoot off dem firewo'ks?"

"You do it, Sam," Vale said. "We'll watch."

With the words, he rose, and turned the porch swing to face the lawn. The gathered guests turned their chairs likewise, but the high canvas-back of the swing effectually hid Vale and Virginia from the others.

They watched the display which Sam set off on the lawn.

"I like fireworks," Virginia said dreamily. "They remind me to remember what sacrifices our forefathers made for us—to think of the independence they won for us."

"You are so independent," he complained.

"Outwardly, yes."

"But inwardly?"

"I believe as you do, Mr. Chatsworth. I want to be dependent upon a man for love, protection and his compassion for my helplessness—provided he shows himself worthy of that trust."

"Under those conditions you would surrender that independence?"

"Yes."

"How splendid of you to say that. I could—good gracious! Your gown is on fire!" and he put his arms about her and smothered the tiny spark from a rocket that had fallen on her sleeve.

She looked at him archly.

"Was that an embrace?"

He pointed to the little black dot the spark had made, then said:

"I won't tell you what I considered it, but you can judge for yourself when I tell you that just as soon as I can show you that I'm going to try to be worthy of you, I'm going to propose to you!"

CHAPTER XXXV.

HER PERFECT HAPPINESS.

THERE was no white-faced misery expressed in the noble, high-bred countenance. It was calm—almost peaceful. It might have been the countenance of Joan of Arc when she felt the flame upon her body which had not power to reach her soul.

It was not that Anne Gordon did not suffer, but that even this blight, tremendous as it was, had not power to reach into and wither the perfect purity and honor of her untarnished soul.

She did not covet that which God had given to another. She sorrowed, but that was all.

She had come at the first call of her friend, and having been shown into the drawing-room to wait, had become weary, and wandered into the conservatory that adjoined both that and the library, to see some rare plant that had attracted her attention through the open arch. She had seen them first, and then had heard their words.

She realized it all, even in those first moments. His heart had never spoken to her through his eyes as she saw it speaking to Marian. His voice had never thrilled with love for her as she heard it thrill as he spoke the name of her old-time and well-loved friend. She saw the gleam of love in his eyes; she heard it in his voice; but even had she not, she could not have failed to see the wild depth of passion in his caress—a caress which not even honor itself had power to strangle.

And then she remembered that he had never kissed her. She remembered that he had never held her in his arms; that he had never called her by the tender names that now fell with such warmth and tenderness from his lips.

A little shiver of humiliation passed over her, that she had let him see her unreciprocal love, but she was too high of soul to allow such a feeling to linger long. She put it from her and stepped forward, not with a haughty pride, not with scorn and contempt for the man who had deceived her, and for the woman who had proven false to their friendship, but with a calm dignity that contained only tenderness and self-renunciation, as she spoke the words:

"Love has found the way!"

She stood there for just a moment after. She saw them fall apart and stand before her as if convicted of a crime, and then, like a tender sunbeam that slips across the floor, she approached them.

She put out both her hands and clasped a hand of each, then lifting herself on tiptoe, she touched June's lips with her own; then stooping, she kissed Marian with like gentleness and affection.

"How little either of you know of trust!" she said, with loving reproach. "You are my two dearest friends on earth, and yet you have cared for me so little that neither of you have really let me see your hearts? Was that generous? Was it even just? Dearest, why did you not tell me?"

She slipped her arm about Marian's waist, and, drawing the girl to her bosom, rested her cheek upon the fair forehead. She felt the tears gush from Marian's eyes, as, in a choked voice, she whispered:

"Forgive me—oh, forgive me!"

Nothing more. She could compel her lips to frame no other sentence, but June came to her relief.

"It is only I whom you have to forgive, Anne," he said humbly. "She is not in fault. I know the dishonor of my action, and I have only this to plead, that——"

But she put up her hand and stopped him, not as if he had hurt her, not as if her self-love and dignity were wounded, but as the tender friend who will not give pain.

"You have nothing to plead, June," she said softly. "You love her. Is it not enough? Do you think that I would have stood between you for one little minute? Forgive me, dear, when I tell you my love was not great enough for that. Why, dear, we have known each other for so many, many years, that I rather think that it was only that I felt a sort of claim on you. I never loved you as—as she loves you, old friend. It would break her heart to give you up, while with me—it only pricks my vanity ever so slightly. Dear June, can you think me so small of soul that anything could make me covet your happiness? Take her, as a gift from me, June! Is it not a sweet one? I love her, and I love you, as my dear brother and sister. Will you not both make me happy by letting me see you in each other's arms again, knowing that you are there with my full and free consent—knowing that you stand together for all eternity, under the light of my blessing?"

To June she seemed halo-crowned as he looked at her. He had always loved her, always admired her above all women save the one that held the life of his soul in her hand; but in that moment he reverenced her above all others.

He knelt before her, and, taking the hem of her dress in his hand, he touched it with his lips.

"I am too filled with guilt and shame to touch you in your white-souled purity!" he said, with a little sob, that fell strangely from his lips. "It would be presumption on my part to ask your forgiveness again, to even say how grieved I am. I could no more be worthy of you than I could of a saint in heaven."

"June!"

There was positive pain in the tone, and Anne Gordon shrank back from him for a moment, but only for a moment; then she leaned forward and took his hand, as if she would assist him to rise.

"June, you make me ashamed!" she said, scarcely above a whisper. "I have done nothing to deserve all this. Get up, dear. There is nothing to pardon—nothing to forgive! You have not sinned. You have done no wrong. As I look back over our little past with each other, I can see that the fault was mine alone. I recall the hour in which I became your promised wife, and I see now what it all meant. It was not love for me that moved you, June; it was love for another. I misunderstood, that was all, and you had not the courage to tell me. Well, perhaps I should not have had the courage myself had our positions been reversed. There is no harm done, June, but I shall not believe that you think so until I see you take this dear girl in your arms and receive my blessing!"

He hesitated but a moment, then he put out his arms, and, with a miserable sob, Marian crept into them.

Anne Gordon took their clasped hands in hers, and, holding them firmly, she raised her eyes to heaven.

"God bless you both!" she said earnestly, "and bring you a long and happy life together!"

Stella Rosevelt

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

"Miss Gladstone, may I trouble you to vacate our chairs?"

"Can you hold him just an instant longer?—Will you dare hold him while I shoot him?"

He caught her frantically to his heart just as she was falling to the ground.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

A terrible storm at sea and from a steamer running between Liverpool and New York is Stella Rosevelt Gladstone, an orphan, on her way to distant relatives in New York. She is befriended by Jacob Rosevelt, who learns her grandmother gave her the name of Star. A fire breaks out and the boats are rapidly filled. Stella refuses to go unless room is made for Mr. Rosevelt, who the next day suffers from an ill turn and is carefully nursed by her. The sixth day they are rescued. Mr. Rosevelt is told of the care Stella gave him during his illness and while thanking her a young man approaches and Mr. Rosevelt introduces Archibald Sherbrooke, whose home is in Derbyshire where Star's father preached. Star's shawl becomes loosened and Mr. Sherbrooke draws an exquisitely carved stone from his necktie and Stella pins the shawl. Stella is met by Mrs. Blunt, Mrs. Richards' housekeeper, who hurries her away. Stella receives a cool reception from her aunt and learns she is to be degraded to the leval of a common servant. Stella appeals to Mr. Richards, giving him the letter written by her father to Mrs. Richards and her reply. Stella has one hundred pounds. Could she not use it and then teach, relieving his wife of all responsibility? Mr. Richards makes arrangements for her to attend a select school, she giving a part of each day to household work. Stella wins, at commencement, a part in the class exercises and promotion to the senior class. Josephine, admiring the cameo worn by Stella, takes it and discovers the initials "A. S." Stella misses the cameo and is suspicious who has it. In the meanwhile Mr. Richards receives a letter from Mrs. Richards' Uncle Jacob. He has lost all, and will accept the home that was offered him when rich. Upon his arrival he is taken to the Lodge to sleep. Mr. Rosevelt meets Star who offers her room to him and does all she can to brighten his life. Mrs. Richards receives him coldly, and Josephine ignores her uncle. Mrs. Richards and Josephine go to Long Branch, where they meet Lord Carrol, of Carrolton, Derbyshire, England. Noticing a ring Josephine wears and examining it he sees the initials "A. S." Josephine claims it is given by a relative. Lord Carrol cannot understand it. The next day he leaves for New York. Stella, hurrying to take a train for home, and in danger, is stopped by Archibald Sherbrooke and the acquaintance renewed. Stella tells him that she and Mr. Rosevelt are in the same home. Mr. Rosevelt goes to New York with Stella to call upon Mr. Sherbrooke in his studio and arranges a pleasure trip for them to Coney Island for the following day. When they return from it Stella is the promised wife of Archibald Sherbrooke. Lord Carrol, of Carrolton, thought to be Josephine's betrothed, is expected. Stella sees in him her promised husband, Archibald Sherbrooke. She passes a sleepless night. Walking to the lodge, she meets Archibald, and he cannot understand why he finds her there. Believing he is acting a part, for he wins her love as Archibald Sherbrooke, he appears as Lord Carrol of Carrolton, the expected husband of her cousin, and refusing his explanation she bids him go back to Josephine and ask her for the cameo he gave her. Archibald seeks Mr. Richards' confidence and explains his position, his meeting Star on the steamer, his interest in her and later her promised husband, his ignorance that she is an inmate of this house, his meeting Stella and her refusal to listen to him. Mrs. Richards, overhearing his story and determined that her plans shall not fail, seeks Stella in the lodge, where she has gone for sympathy from Mr. Rosevelt. She upbraids Stella for conducting herself in a shameless manner, misconstruing Lord Carrol's attentions and accusing him with unfaithfulness. Stella is crushed with shame and humiliation, and the next morning Mr. Rosevelt and Stella go to New York where they make their home. Lord Carrol leaves a note for Josephine requesting her to send the cameo to his address. Stella graduates with honor from the Normal College and Mr. Appleton introduces her as the author of "Chatsworth's Pride." She meets Grace Meredith and her brother Ralph who requests the pleasure, with his sister, of calling upon her. Reaching home, Mr. Rosevelt tells to Stella the story of his life, his love for and engagement to be married to Stella's grandmother, and then his love for her for her kindness to him. The next day is her eighteenth birthday and to celebrate Mr. Rosevelt invites her for a ride and calling at a beautiful house she is met by Mrs. Blunt who has a nice lunch for them, after which they go through the house and Mr. Rosevelt admits she is to be his heiress. Going to Newport, they meet Mrs. Richards and Josephine, who are stunned when they learn of his immense wealth and intention to leave all to Stella.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

RESCUED FROM A HORRIBLE FATE.

IF Mrs. Richards had conducted herself according to her own inclination, she would have left Newport at once. But she was unwilling that Mr. Rosevelt or Star should think that she had run away from them, or that she was heartbroken over the disclosures which her uncle had made to her.

Besides, Newport was full of wealthy and fashionable people, and among them several eligible young gentlemen, whose acquaintance, for Josephine's sake, she was desirous of cultivating; and surely she was not going to sacrifice all these advantages, and leave the field clear for Star to win even greater victories.

No; she would stay, and she resolved she would make things just as uncomfortable for the young girl as possible, while Josephine should be made to shine with all the splendor of which their means, and Mr. Richards' credit, were capable.

But all the proud woman's efforts were of no avail, for our fair heroine had created a sensation which threatened to turn the heads and lead captive hearts of every unmarried man, at least, in Newport.

A week passed quickly by, and then Grace Meredith and her brother arrived at the watering place, and immediately attached themselves to Mr. Rosevelt and Star by mutual consent; and many envious looks were bestowed upon the dark, handsome stranger, who appeared to assume the right of acting as escort to the two beautiful girls upon every occasion.

But Star, whenever she appeared in company, laughed, chatted and danced with all that was possible of her admirers, dispensing her smiles and favors with an impartiality that was exasperating not only to her victims—if such they could be called who were each anxious to win the prize—but also to the many forlorn damsels who were all sighing for the attentions she was receiving and the honors she was usurping.

One day, about a week after the arrival of the Merediths, an excursion was arranged to visit a point on Narragansett Bay, and it was to be a picnic after the good old-fashioned style of carrying each his own basket and sharing with his neighbor.

A boat had been chartered to take the party down the bay in the morning and return at night by moonlight.

Ralph Meredith and two or three of his friends were the originators of the affair, and the invitations were very select, and limited to one hundred.

As it happened, Mrs. Richards and Josephine, with quite a number of others from their hotel, were included in this party.

Josephine Richards had arrayed herself in a very elaborate costume for the occasion, determined that Star, who she knew was to be one of the company, should not outshine her.

It fitted her like a glove, and was vastly becoming; she never had looked more brilliant in her life, but she was too fussy for a picnic, and looked as if she were decked out for a fashionable reception rather than for a day in the woods.

In direct contrast to all this "fuss and feathers" was Star, in a simple suit of white lawn, a belt of blue, of her eyes' own hue, girding her slender waist; a dainty, broad-brimmed hat, set in a jaunty way upon her golden head, and a little cluster of blue-fringed gentians nestling beneath her beautifully rounded chin.

The very simplicity of her attire made her conspicuous, and fashionable maidens, who had groaned in spirit over what they should wear and how they should wear it, glared at her with envious eyes.

Ralph Meredith had arranged a cozy little nook on the boat for Star and his sister, by taking some camp chairs along and cushioning them with handsome rugs, with a couple of hassocks for their feet, while a sail had been adjusted as an awning to screen them from the hot sun.

But when, after they were well on their way, he conducted them thither, he found to his chagrin that this snug corner, upon which he had spent so much care, had been appropriated by Mrs. Richards and her brilliant daughter, who were holding a little court by themselves.

They moved away to another portion of the boat, but when, an hour later, they saw the interlopers promenading the deck, they quietly slipped into the vacated seats, and settled themselves for the remainder of the sail.

Here they were soon chatting in the most sociable manner, and were right in the midst of a most interesting discussion when a cold voice broke out upon them, saying:

"Miss Gladstone, may I trouble you to vacate our chairs?"

Star started and flushed. Too well she knew those incisive tones.

But she quickly recovered herself, however, and looking up at Mrs. Richards, for it was she who had spoken, said:

"Your chairs? Are they yours?"

"Certainly; you have already seen us occupying them, I believe," the woman responded, haughtily.

Star's face began to dimple with amusement, for she knew well enough that this demand was only made to annoy her and make her unpleasantly conspicuous, and she was determined to turn the tables to their own mortification; for they could not fail to learn when they landed to whom the chairs and other comforts belonged.

She made a motion to Grace, who, she saw, was bristling with indignation, to keep silent; then she arose, bowing with graceful politeness to Mrs. Richards and her daughter, though her eyes were gleaming with suppressed laughter.

"I beg pardon if I have been occupying what does not rightfully belong to me, and I cheerfully resign my chair to your prior claim."

Josephine flushed, for she saw that it was all Star could do to restrain her merriment, though what should have caused it she could not understand; while she looked so pretty and was so ladylike, it made her angry.

"I'm sure," she began, hotly, and raising her voice so that others could hear her, "I don't see what you're so amused over, Stella Gladstone; and it seems to me that you're putting on altogether too many airs for a girl who used to perform the services of a chambermaid in our house."

For a moment Star stood as if dumfounded; then she lifted her bright head a trifle, as if in conscious superiority, gave Miss Richards a cool stare of surprise, and turned away without a word.

Not so Miss Meredith, however.

She kept her seat with the utmost composure, watching this little scene with both interest and amusement until Josephine so tauntingly insulted her friend.

Then she, too, arose, drawing her tall form to its fullest height.

"I cannot understand," she said, in a voice of scorn, "why you should so maliciously insult Miss Gladstone; but allow me to say for your enlightenment, that these chairs, rugs and so forth, belong to my brother, Mr. Ralph Meredith, and he arranged them here especially for Miss Gladstone's and my comfort. However, I will emulate her example, and resign my right to ladies who have proved themselves so superior in point of refinement and politeness."

Having uttered this cutting sarcasm, Miss Meredith bowed mockingly and walked away to rejoin her friend, leaving those haughty and overbearing women about as chagrined and crestfallen as it is possible for two people to feel.

The gay company reached their destination after a delightful sail of two hours.

It was a lovely grove upon the shore of the bay, which people were in the habit of frequenting for picnics of this sort, and the party wandered about in groups for another two hours, exploring the beauties and attractions about them.

Mr. Rosevelt and Star, Miss Meredith and her brother, with two or three others, wandered away by themselves, and finally sat down beneath a wide-spreading tree for a quiet chat.

While they sat there, Star got up quietly and slipped out of sight, some spirit of restlessness possessing her to get away for a ramble still farther into the far-reaching woods.

She had walked some distance, when she heard voices, and soon saw a gentleman and a lad, both with guns over their shoulders, approaching her, and looking heated and anxious.

They saluted her courteously, and then the gentleman said, abruptly:

"Have you seen anything of a small, white Spitz dog, miss? It is a pretty little creature, wearing a silver collar around his neck, and tiny blue bows tied in his ears."

"No," Star answered; "I have seen no dog today."

"We are in search of it because we are afraid it has run mad," the stranger continued, peering about with a troubled countenance. "It has not been well for several days, and this morning showed unmistakable signs of hydrophobia. It escaped confinement from the cottage, a mile or so from here, and ran toward these woods about an hour ago."

They passed on, and Star thought it would be best for her to go back to her friends, and therefore turned to retrace her steps.

She had only accomplished about half of the distance, when she heard a clear laugh ring out from among the shrubbery on the right of the path.

Thinking it must be some of her party, she stepped forward to warn them of their danger. She parted the branches with her hands and looked through.

What was her horror to see Josephine Richards sitting at the foot of a tree, her hat tossed upon the ground beside her, and holding in her lap the little mad dog against which she had just been warned.

Miss Richards evidently had just coaxed the little pet into her lap, and was playing with it without a suspicion of the terrible danger that she was in, while just for that moment it showed no signs of the madness which possessed it.

Star's face was as white as her spotless dress as she took in the dreadful situation; then she stepped quickly forward and said, in clear but authoritative tones:

"Miss Richards, put that dog down as quietly as you can, and come away with me instantly, for I have just been told that it is mad."

Scarcely were the words uttered, when the little creature snapped at the hand raised to caress it, and, with a scream of fright, Josephine sprang to her feet and turned to fly.

But the act aroused all the fury of the maddened animal, and he seized hold of her skirts, biting and tearing them in the most furious manner, foaming at the mouth, and howling frightfully in its sudden paroxysm of frenzy.

"Save me! save me!" Josephine screamed, and flying toward Star for protection.

There was not a thought of personal danger in the fair young girl's heart—not a thought of enmity, or of malice or evil; all her mind was concentrated upon one thing—how best to save her companion from this terrible danger and from a horrible death.

"Stand still!" she commanded, in steady, almost stern tones. "Let him bite at your clothes all he chooses, but do not allow him to get at your feet; if you run, he will seize them and bite right through your boot. Have you courage to stand where you are for a moment? I will go behind him and slip the end of my parasol through his collar and pin him to the ground; then you can go and call help for me."

She spoke calmly but rapidly, and Josephine saw at once how much wisdom there was in her plan.

"Yes, yes; I will do anything," she said, hysterically; "but be quick, for I cannot bear this much longer; I shall faint dead away."

"If you faint," Star returned, in an awful voice, "you are lost! Be still just a moment longer, and I will save you if I can."

Watching her opportunity, she stole softly behind the struggling animal, and, by a dexterous movement, slipped the end of her parasol, which was quite a stout one, into his collar, and then, with all her strength, drove it into the ground and held it there, though the creature struggled furiously to release himself.

Her face had not an atom of color in it, but her lips did not falter as she said to the horror-stricken girl watching her:

"Go quickly and call help for me. I cannot hold him long."

Josephine did not need a second bidding, but went shrieking back to the company.

She had not been gone two minutes when the bushes behind Star parted again, and the same gentleman who had met and warned her of this danger sprang toward her, with his gun cocked and aimed at the dog.

His face was almost as colorless as her own.

"Can you hold him just an instant longer?—will you dare hold him while I shoot him? I will not harm you in the least," he questioned, in rapid tones.

"Yes, I will hold him," she said, resolutely. "If I let him loose now, he will surely bite somebody."

There was an instant of silence, then a quick, sharp report rang through the woods, and the little danger fiend lay bleeding and dead at her feet.

All peril was past.

Star had saved an enemy from a horrible fate—she had done a heroic deed; but the tension on her own nerves gave way when it was over. She swayed, tottered and would have fallen to the ground, but another figure sprang through the bushes to her side to save her, and her fainting form was received into the strong arms of Ralph Meredith.

CHAPTER XXIX.

JOSEPHINE'S INGRATITUDE.

Confusion reigned during the next half hour among the company who had hitherto been so gay. Josephine Richards had rushed into their midst, startling everybody out of their senses by shrieking out:

"Go to Miss Gladstone! A mad dog! a mad dog!"

It was all that she could say, for she immediately after sank down helpless in a violent fit of hysterics, while the women, with white faces, huddled together in fear and trembling, and the men, with horrified eyes and quaking hearts, ran hither and thither in search of Star.

Then there had come that quick, sharp report, directing them to the spot, and telling them that all danger to them was past. But the terrible question arose:

"Was Miss Gladstone safe?"

Ralph Meredith, his feet winged with love and fear, was, as we have seen, first upon the scene of the tragedy, and caught her frantically to his heart just as she was falling to the ground.

"Is she bitten?" he cried, in a voice of agony, and with ashen lips, to the stranger, who stood, gun in hand, over the dead dog.

"No; she has not even a scratch; she has merely fainted from fright," he answered; and throwing down his gun, he took a long pocket flask filled with brandy from his hunting pouch, and approached the unconscious girl.

He knelt upon the ground beside her and poured a few drops between her lips, though his hands trembled violently from the terrible excitement and anxiety under which he had been laboring.

"Go for some water," he said to his son, who, having heard the report of his father's fowling-piece, now appeared upon the scene.

He darted away like a fawn, and was back in less than three minutes with a pitcherful, which he had seized from the camp, while a frightened crowd followed at his heels.

But it was a long time before Star revived. The shock to her nervous system had been a terrible one, and nature seemed loath to resume her sway after it. But at the end of half an hour her chest began to heave, and a slight tinge of color returned to her lips.

Ralph Meredith, who hung over her in an agony of suspense and fear, would let no one touch her or come near her, save his sister and Mr. Rosevelt; and he found that it required all the strength of his will to keep him from betraying to the gaping crowd the passionate love he entertained for the senseless girl.

Finally, to everybody's relief, those white lids were unclosed, those beautiful eyes looked up, and a long, shuddering sigh shook her whole frame.

"What has happened?" she questioned, with a vacant look.

"You are faint, dear. Drink this and you will be better," Grace Meredith said, gently, while she held a silver cup to her lips.

She swallowed the stimulus mechanically, and then began to shiver, as if from the cold.

"I remember," she murmured, all the color fading from her face again, and they feared another season of unconsciousness would follow.

"Is he dead?" she asked, a moment after, beginning to rally once more.

"Yes; he was killed instantly," Ralph Meredith returned.

"And Josephine—Miss Richards—is she safe?"

Everybody looked surprised at this query, for no one had had any idea that that young lady had been in any danger until now.

"Yes; Miss Richards is safe," Mr. Rosevelt answered; but a frown contracted his brow as he began to understand that Star had sacrificed her own safety and endangered her own life to save that of an ungrateful girl.

No one had been able to gather from Josephine's excited and incoherent account anything save that a mad dog had attacked Miss Gladstone in the woods. She said not a word of how the noble girl had come to her rescue, warned her of her danger, and then put into execution a hazardous plan to secure her safety.

There was not an ounce of gratitude in her heart toward Star for having done this heroic deed—no softening, no sense of sorrow or repentance for her own unkindness in the past, or for the insult which she had only that day offered her; there was only a sense of triumph that she herself was safe, no matter how or at whose risk.

When Star found that Josephine had kept the facts of the encounter with the mad dog to herself, simply stating that Miss Gladstone had been attacked by it, she also appeared very reluctant to converse about it, and as the subject seemed to excite her, no one felt disposed to press her with questions.

Upon reaching the boat they improvised a couch for Star on deck, and by resting quietly during the two hours' sail, she seemed almost like herself when the vessel touched the pier at Newport.

A carriage was here procured, and she was driven, with Mr. Rosevelt, Miss Meredith and

THE travel letters of Mrs. Marsh are so well liked, to judge by numerous letters and cards asking for more of them, that it is gratifying to be able to print another, this time of a trip to the seashore, and such an interesting account that reading it is next best to being there in person. It is kind of Mrs. Marsh to give us this pleasure for she is a busy woman. Perhaps you have taken a trip that another would like to take but cannot. Don't you think an interesting description of everything you saw and did would be enjoyed by that person? I do, so we'll hope for more and more travel letters.—Ed.

The Earth Turned Sideways

By Mrs. James Marsh.

One day this old earth took a mighty breath, and in doing so completely disarranged the successive folds of its covering so badly that it just had to break somewhere, and it was in this "Somewhere," with its folds all protruding through the surface of the shore, making a long line of reefs with ragged, razor-like tops, with the softer material in between worn away by the waves, leaving masses of calcium, glistening and sparkling, that we made our objective point in search of shells, seaweed and other specimens.

An hour's ride from Los Angeles, Calif., to San Pedro; a small bus ride to Point Firmin, and a pleasant half hour's hike along the cliffs, brought us to White's Point, a rocky prominence, along an indented coast-line to the "Reefs."

It is in these Reefs that myriads of all kinds of sea life are to be found that are never heard of in or around sandy beaches.

Abalone Point, so called because of the large amount of abolones who take advantage of it for a breeding ground, is about the most formidable place to get to, or to get around all along the beach, and as we approached it we were greeted by a fine herd of 10 seals, whose coarse barking called our attention as they sunned themselves on the rocks in a lagoon formed by the reefs. Their big appealing eyes and sensitiveness to sound as we called and whistled to them made them "sit up and take notice" of our efforts to be chums, for they tossed their heads around as if to say, "Come again."

Here is a pure blue-black shellfish. What makes it adopt a splash of orange at the entrance to its mouth, in the shell? It cannot be seen unless you remove the fish.

The beautiful pearly interior of the abalone, only by its death can be seen. The outside is dark and very uninviting.

When the Maker fashioned the seaweed he summoned all the colors together to vie with each other to beautify the delicate sea lace and damask—fair blues and reds tipped with white; pinks tinged with reds and other combinations along their fronds that wave in graceful ringlets with each wavelet.

As you sit and ponder you may read in the strata an open book as it lies open before you. The lesson has no end.

The tall cliffs are formed of the debris of a passed world and age, and many shells are seen protruding from them, high up and down to sea level.

The house hunting problem seems to be as vital a problem in fish land as with us, for few shells are tenantless, being occupied by their original owners or a tenant who has taken a lease of it; the despised hermit crab.

It was indeed a "Song Day" we spent that day, for four young men gave us several pieces (quartette) in the train as we went and the seals gave us a chorus of barks and groans, but sweetest of all was a girl's voice, some four summers, who sang clearly and sweetly as we came home on the car from the station: "Jesus loves me, this I know."

If one will read, what a mine of information; what a divergence in rocks and stones; what sermons.

It was hard work breaking away from it all, though our backs were breaking, for what a fascination to watch the sea-urchins turning around in their self-made rocky prisons; the sea-anemones, of all colors, closing up their long green tentacles as we fed them with crushed shells, some, like the urchins, covered in small stones to hide themselves.

What glories of color, and what a number of ideas there are to watch and find out from each how it lives and moves for its food.

"A couple of kids once more," we did not realize what we were doing until it came to departing time and we prepared to carry off the spoils of the sea. There was nothing left but to "grin and bear it," because nothing could be thrown out, besides. Many a "Sister" who did not live near the sea or was shut-in and less fortunate than I, would be glad when she opened the parcel and saw the beautiful shells.

One mile brought us to our street car that took us to the train and soon we were home.

Did we rest? The victims had to be boiled to preserve their houses, the seaweed had to be washed and set out to dry and the specimens, of which we found we had 78 varieties of shells, had to be put out of harm's way until we could arrange for our cabinet.

Two weary bodies laid down to rest that night; no swan song was necessary to rock them to sleep.

SALADS furnish a use for leftovers and are more healthful during hot weather than heavier foods. They need not be lacking in nutrition, and after the men folks of the family become accustomed to them—sometimes this requires tact—they will like an occasional salad supper quite as well as a supper that rquires hours of cooking and work in a hot kitchen. Try it and see. —Ed.

RADISH SALAD.—Peel and slice enough radishes to make one cupful when sliced. Add one tablespoon of sliced olives and mix well. Serve on crisp lettuce leaves with French dressing. Decorate with radishes cut to represent a rose.

VEGETABLE SALAD.—On crisp lettuce leaves put a layer of Bermuda onions, thinly sliced, a layer of cucumbers and on top a layer of tomatoes. Serve with French dressing.

LOBSTER SALAD.—Remove meat from one large lobster. Mix thoroughly with dressing made as follows: Beat one egg, one-quarter teaspoon mustard, one-quarter teaspoon salt and one-eighth teaspoon pepper together, add one tablespoon vinegar and one tablespoon of butter, put on stove and let thicken.—MRS. J. O., Portland, Maine.

MOCK SAUSAGE WITH SAVORY RICE.—Soak one cup of dried lima beans over night in cold water, drain, cover with fresh cold water and cook until soft. Put through a potato ricer, discarding the skins that will not press through. Or, use fresh or canned baby lima beans. Add one-half cup of dried and rolled bread-crumbs, three tablespoons of butter, salt and pepper, one-half teaspoon of ground sage, one teaspoon of scraped onion, one beaten egg, and just milk enough to hold the mixture together. Shape to resemble sausages, roll in beaten egg, then in bread-crumbs and fry in deep fat. Serve on a bed of rice prepared as follows: Wash one-half cup of rice, and slowly drop into two quarts of boiling water to which one-half teaspoon of salt has been added. Boil rapidly half an hour, taking care it does not stick by occasionally lifting it with a fork. Do not stir. Turn into a sieve, drain, cover with a cloth and rest over a kettle of hot water for twenty minutes. While the rice is steaming, cook two tablespoons of fat with one small onion sliced very fine and one teaspoon of curry-powder. When the onion is brown, add one-half cup of thick stewed tomato, cook five minutes and pour over the hot rice which has been spread on a platter. Arrange the "sausages" on the rice.

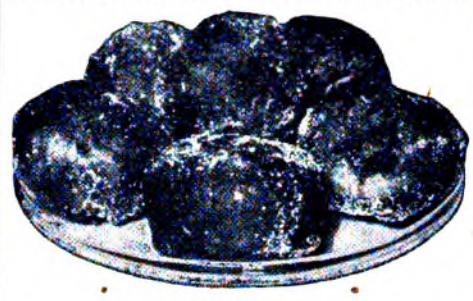
MEAT SALAD.—Put through a meat chopper one cup of meat, cooked and cut into small pieces, one cooked beet, one cooked potato, one tablespoon parsley and one slice of onion. Season to taste and form into balls. Serve on lettuce leaves with French dressing.

SALMON SALAD.—Separate the salmon into flakes, using either canned or fresh salmon. Place on lettuce leaves and surround with cold green peas that have been mixed with French dressing.

POTATO SALAD.—Dice cold potatoes, add one small onion, chopped fine, one sweet pepper, salt and pepper to taste and a few drops of vinegar. Mix and put on lettuce leaves. Serve with salad dressing.

CINNAMON ROLLS.—Melt one-half cup of shortening in two cups of hot milk. Equal parts of lard and butter is the best. When lukewarm, add one even teaspoon of salt, one-half yeast-cake dissolved in half a cup of lukewarm water, and one beaten egg. Add flour to handle, and set to rise covered closely and in a warm place away from drafts. When the dough has risen to about twice its bulk, cut down and knead until smooth. Roll fairly thin, spread with melted butter, and add a light sprinkling of cinnamon and sugar mixed. Make into a long roll, the same as jelly roll, Cut in half-inch slices from one end of the roll, place in baking tin so they will not touch, and set to rise until light. Bake in a hot oven.



CINNAMON ROLLS.

SWEET POTATO SALAD.—Boil three large sweet potatoes, cut in small squares, add two stalks of celery, cut in small pieces, and season with salt and pepper. Cut up three or four small sweet pickles and half-a-dozen olives and add to potatoes, with teaspoon of onion juice. Serve with French dressing.—M. E. W., Augusta, Maine.

FRENCH DRESSING.—One-half teaspoon salt, one-quarter teaspoon pepper, two tablespoons vinegar and four tablespoons olive oil. Mix and stir until well blended, or pour into bottle and shake well.

FRIED MUFFINS.—Mix together three cups of sifted flour, two tablespoons of sugar, two rounding teaspoons of baking powder, and one teaspoon of salt, then sift again. Beat two eggs until light and creamy, add one cup of milk, and then the dry mixture. Beat hard. Drop by spoonfuls into deep hot fat and fry to a golden brown, turning several times during the cooking. Roll in sugar and serve warm. A spoonful of jelly, dry applesauce or mincemeat may be folded into each spoonful of batter as it is dropped into the hot fat. Delicious served with coffee.

BOILED DRESSING.—One teaspoon mustard, one-half tablespoon salt, few grains cayenne pepper, one-quarter teaspoon paprika, one and one-half tablespoons sugar, one-half tablespoon flour, one and one-half tablespoons melted butter, three-quarters cup of milk, yolks of two eggs and one-quarter cup of vinegar. Mix dry ingredients well together, add yolks of eggs, beaten, butter, milk and vinegar. Cook in double boiler until mixture is thick.—O. G. L., Maine.

SNOW PUDDING.—One pint boiling water, three good-sized tablespoons of corn-starch, beat the whites of three eggs to a stiff froth, moisten the corn-starch in a little water, then stir it into the boiling water while still boiling, add one tablespoon of sugar, a pinch of salt and the beaten whites of the three eggs, let boil a few minutes then pour into a teacup to cool. For sauce make a common custard of the yolks of the three eggs and a scant pint of milk, sweeten and flavor to taste. When ready to serve, turn out the little puddings from the cups into individual glass dishes and pour over each one the golden-colored sauce.—MRS. M. O. MACKINTOSH, Canton, Ill.

POTATO CROQUETTES.—Pare potatoes, nearly cover with boiling salted water and cook until they can be pierced with a fork. Drain, and shake dry on a hot cover. Mash. To each pint add one tablespoon of butter, one tablespoon of milk, the beaten yolk of one egg and pepper and salt to taste. Beat hard, and if the mixture seems a little stiff, add a very little milk.

POTATO CROQUETTES.

When cool enough to handle, shape by first rolling a little of the potato into round ball, and then with the hand flat, into a roll. Roll in finely-rolled cracker-crumbs, then in lightly-beaten egg to which a little water has been added, and then in crumbs again. Fry in deep fat. Do not put in too many at a time as it will cool the fat and cause the crust to soak fat and break off.

CHOCOLATE RICE PUDDING.—Put four cups of milk in double boiler and when scalded add one-half cup of rice, five tablespoons sugar, one tablespoon butter, three tablespoons grated chocolate and one-third teaspoon salt. Cook for two hours or more. Just before taking from stove, add one teaspoon of vanilla. Serve hot with whipped cream.—MRS. H. D. OSBORNE, News Ferry, Virginia.

BANANA MOUSSE.—Press four peeled bananas through potato ricer and squeeze over pulp juice of half a lemon. Mix with three-quarters of a pint of chilled cream, whipped stiff, and sweeten with half a cup of powdered sugar. Turn into mould with a watertight cover and bury in ice and rock salt for three hours before serving.—MARIETTA COLLINS, Thorsby, Ala.

BANANA SNOW.—Peel and slice six ripe bananas and mash to fine pulp. Add juice of lemon, whites of two eggs and whip mixture as you would cream. Add two tablespoons of sugar and whip until sugar is dissolved. Serve with berries or diced pineapple scattered over top.—MRS. WALTER CAMPBELL, Greensburg, Indiana.

BAKED BEEF HASH.—Chop one cup of cooked beef and add to one cup of hot milk. To this add one cup of cooked rice, two tablespoons of butter and salt and pepper to taste. Remove from fire, let cool a little and add one well-beaten egg. Bake fifteen minutes in hot oven.

Sada.—You have opened the way for letters that will be of help to the majority of mothers for most of us have wondered how we could keep our youngsters amused on rainy days.—Ed.

PITTSFIELD, ILL.

MY DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORTABLE SISTERS:

Some time ago I tried to enter your circle but failed to use the right pass word. I promised myself I would not try again but when I saw in the February issue the question, "What is economy?" by one of the sisters, I just couldn't keep still for there is not a word in the English language that I am better acquainted with than "Economy." It is one of my earliest recollections and should have been my middle name, and having practiced its precepts for twenty-four years of married life I feel competent to speak.

One can be economical and not miserly, can save and yet not "skimp," can enjoy comforts and not waste—there it seems to be in a nutshell, but sometimes hard to crack. Many of us have our pet economies. One of mine is my bedding and table furnishings. I watch for the white goods sales at home and in mail-order catalogues and buy one new sheet and one pair of pillow cases every year. You do not notice the small amount at the time and by this method always have sheets for the emergency. We use Indian Head napkins and table-cloths for every-day use, thus saving the good damask. I buy a square of the 54-inch Indian Head for the cloth and enough more for napkins, eighteen inches wide. Some I simply hem on the machine and am now doing a table-cloth in Delft blue crochet edge with Dutch gingham in two tone blue gingham applique, the napkins are made to match and will be good enough for any company.

Another method of saving in both labor and material is covering the ends of quilts and blankets with slips of cheese-cloth, about fourteen inches deep; these can be easily slipped off and washed, thus saving the hard work of washing an entire quilt or blanket. So much for beds and table economy.

Most of our face cloths are made from towels which became worn in the middle. By cutting out the worn part, two face cloths can be made. Sometimes I finish these by crocheting an edge but more often by blanket stitch. Old underwear, two thickness, make good face cloths, finish in same manner as others. The holders used about the kitchen are made from two thickness of men's clothing, finished as above described.

I came across an old recipe for chapped hands which does not call for a lot of expensive drugs. Take one-half cup of rolled oats and pour one cup of boiled rain water (after cooling) on the oats and then add one ounce of glycerine and it is ready to use. The oats when rubbed into the flesh leave a fine powder which covers up a multitude of sins and holds the glycerine.

I save all paraffin bread paper and find many uses for it. It is fine to rub the stove with while it is still warm and leaves a clean polish. It can be used in cake pans and to wrap up lunches, also to rub iron on when ironing.

One of the sisters asked whether it was wiser to buy cheap material for wearing apparel and wear it out or buy good quality and work it over from time to time. My two small daughters say, "Oh, buy the cheap so we won't have to wear it the rest of our lives," so the question is still a question for I try both methods. I disguise old familiar dresses with dyes and sometimes feel well repaid.

This season of the year in a country town, finds the cook of the family at her wit's ends to furnish a balanced diet with so little from which to choose. Tin can and paper bag cookery does not appeal to me, but we are compelled to resort to the tin cans. The farmer's wife has fresh pork, chickens, eggs and vegetables in the cellar, the city dweller has the shipped in fresh vegetables and fruits—now won't someone come to the rescue of the small town inhabitant and suggest a menu that we can follow.

We have a neighborhood club of twenty-four members. I wish some of the sisters would help me with suggestions as to entertainments, contests, etc. Will gladly exchange ideas with anyone interested. We have tried many things but want something new. Would be pleased to find a photographer's wife among you.

Thanking you all for many helpful hints on various subjects,

Sincerely, MRS. EVA SHINN.

SO. ROYALTON, R. R. 1, BOX 2J, VT.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I like the COMFORT Sisters' pin and shall get one. I would like to see this letter printed so I would feel that I was a "COMFORT Sister."

We live on a small farm, two and one-half miles from town. Have a son, three years old.

I like to crochet, sew, embroider and do patchwork. I am starting my Christmas gifts as I make most of them. I think it would be nice to exchange Christmas ideas with each other.

I am five feet, four inches tall, weigh 115 pounds and have medium brown hair and grey eyes.

MRS. NELSON GAGE.

Mrs. Gage.—You should have started the ball a-rolling by telling us what you are to make for Christmas gifts and how you make them. I am saving a few letters along that line for publication next month maybe. Shall be glad to get more letters to be published with those already received.—Ed.

COLTEWAH, TENN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

First, I want to thank you for forwarding all those letters to me. Second, to ask your forgiveness for all the trouble my thoughtlessness caused. I never dreamed of such a thing. When the envelope came this morning I thought, "What's this? I haven't ordered anything from COMFORT." When opened I found forty letters and all wanting to know about the Woman's Exchange I spoke about in my other letter. Now I can appreciate more the work you are doing, but if I were you I would not print the letters from those (like myself) who, for no reason whatever, ask you not to print their name and address. Then you would have no letters to forward.

Now for a favor. Will you print this for the benefit of those who did not send stamps and who only wanted the address of the Woman's Exchange. As I get time I shall answer all who sent stamps.

Sisters, the Exchange I wrote about is in Chattanooga and is only one small room. I'm afraid if you all sent work there, the women near would not have any room, so why not try your nearest city? Surely there must be such a place in all large cities. I don't believe they receive work by mail, at the Exchange I spoke of in Chattanooga. When we pay our membership fee we are given a card with our number on it. This number, with our name, is written in a ledger with the amount and price of all work and a strict account of the work sold is kept. We put the price on our work and give them 20 per cent. for selling it, so we have to charge quite high. They sell all kinds of fancy work and homemade candies, cakes, bread, etc., also serve lunches. I do not belong to it now as I get orders for all the work I have time to do.

You who want to make money, why not try raising poultry or livestock of some kind? There is always a demand for chickens and fresh eggs.

Since I wrote you, another baby has come to our home. On the 19th of February a sweet, little, red-haired, blue-eyed girl, Margaret Mae, arrived. Now we have three. Ruby Bell, four, J. L., Jr., two, and the baby, so you see I don't have much time for tatting, but I still find time to play with the babies. It wouldn't be home without them.

We lived in Chattanooga until last spring. Then my husband's place of work shut down so we came out here. I like the country better. This is just a small town. My husband enlisted in the army at the beginning of the war and was stationed at Fort Oglethorpe two years. W lived there in a government house and he stayed at home. I should like to hear from any of my friends who lived there then.

Mrs. Pettitt, I enjoy the letters but I would rather see a baby's picture in COMFORT than have a letter in its place, for I love all babies.

Pearl Vesey, where are you and how is your COMFORT garden this year?

Sisters, what do you think of our pin? I think it is what we need and am sending for mine.

With best wishes to all,

MRS. J. L. CANNON (ROSEBUD).

Mrs. Cannon.—When it comes to deciding between two equally good letters, the one with name and address is always given preference unless there seems a good reason for withholding it, such as baring of secrets, gossip or unpleasant comments, etc. Every nom de plume means that I'll have to forward from one to fifty letters to that person. I'm glad to do this in all cases that are really necessary but please sign your name and address whenever possible. Thank you.—Ed.

LOS ANGELES, 343 West 58th St., CALIF.

MY DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

How often I have said, "I believe I will write to COMFORT tomorrow," and tomorrow never came so I've decided to write today. It has been several years since my last letter appeared in COMFORT and I wonder if you would believe, that during those years I have corresponded with not less than two dozen of the sisters regularly and many more at intervals. I received hundreds of letters and answered every one because they were mostly from the sick who wanted to know about the climate of Arizona, for that is where I lived until recently. I want to thank you, Mrs. W., for printing my letter for through COMFORT I found one friend who is as dear as a sister and that means a lot to me for my only sister died. You are a dear to be so patient and impartial and yours is a splendid work. Thousands are made happy because of this department. I could tell you of many whom I know but it would take too much space. I'm sure all who read the sisters' letters receive help. Many dozens of times in my life I have been benefited by COMFORT in general and by Sisters' Corner in particular. I feel so sorry for the unhappy sisters but, do you know, I feel that this life is a school and that each experience is a lesson. It would not be best for us if all were happy experiences. I am a great believer in God and that He knows best and that He allows these things, not because he sanctions them but because the Prince of this World is Darkness and Sin and will be so till the Prince of Peace comes. I realize that some Christian Science sister or brother would like to bump me. Who cares! All of my corners have been bumped off long ago. Now changing the subject will some one tell me how men are to hold their wives' affection? It's a question I have never seen discussed in these columns or elsewhere. I've read a lot about wifey keeping herself dressed attractively lest hubby "tire" of her. Who thinks hubby should wear a collar and tie, keep himself well shaven and wear a coat around the house lest wifey "tire" of him? Now honest, isn't a man altogether unlovely when in dishabille? As for my hubby, he lounges about in this unlovely manner often—on my very best sofa pillows too! yes'm! I haven't a thing too good to use. I believe in cleanliness and comfort. Clean bungalow aprons or Perky Peggys if you like. Morning caps are not taboo with me but I like them to match or harmonize with the morning dress. I do this for the sake of decency and not to "hold" my husband. I never try to look as neat when mopping and scouring—by the way, hubby helps me—as I do when serving meals. Neither of us try to look handsome while doing this sort of work. If love isn't more than skin deep it is not the kind that will stand the wear and tear of matrimony and who wants to hold such shallow love? Men should be handsome, women should be lovely when possible—but neatness about one's dirty work is sufficient. Most of all I study comfort about the home. "It takes a lot of living in a house to make it Home," sisters. Don't keep treasures hidden. Fess up. How many of you have them? Get them out and use them and enjoy them.

Our house burned a few years ago. We did not save a thing. I did not covet, even the things that belonged to my mother before her death. I had used and enjoyed everything I had and after all the smoke had cleared away I said, "I'm glad Pollyanna wise and otherwise." I'm glad I enjoyed them as long as I did. Most of all I was glad that my false teeth were at the dentist's. Honest. Now you are wondering if I'm ancient? Ever hear of any one having teeth extracted early in life? My health is better since I had the old ones out. That and the dry, pure air of Arizona

A Modern Maud Muller

By Alma Henderson

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"Maud Muller on a summer's day,
Raked the meadows, sweet with hay.
Beneath her torn hat glowed a wealth
Of simple beauty and rustic health."

GREAT black clouds rolled up out of the west, and distant muttering of thunder threatened ominously.

The young man guiding a massive roadster recklessly along the uneven country road glanced apprehensively over his shoulder, then back at his companion, with a distraught smile.

"I think we'll be able to make Miami before the storm hits," he assured, confidently.

The imperious young beauty at his side executed an obviously much-practiced shrug ere replying querulously:

"I should hope so! It's your own fault if we don't. You ought to have started for home sooner!"

The young man compressed his lips and stared straight ahead. He had long since ceased trying to analyze the inconsistencies of Miss Leona Renfro.

Upon the present occasion, they had tarried at the lake when the other picnickers departed, at the young lady's own request. And only after numerous suggestions from him that he feared a storm was brewing would she consider leaving the place.

"Oh, well, 'Consistency, thou art a jewel,'" he mused, with a cynical smile.

The girl noted her companion's stern mouth and unbending attitude, and was at no loss for the reason thereof. Usually, when affairs had reached this stage, she would relent and graciously extend a fig branch—figuratively, at least.

But just now, Leona Renfro was altogether too angry and disappointed to reason sanely. She had taken a great amount of pains with her toilette upon this particular occasion, wearing one of her prettiest, filmiest summer frocks and garden hats, instead of a regulation sports costume, as the other girls had worn. And this, because she realized how entrancingly the fresh, apple-green hue set off her shimmering gold hair and alabaster complexion!

For two months past she had been futilely expecting a proposal of marriage from the young man now seated at her side. Undoubtedly, he had given her some reason for this supposition. And with a fixed purpose of forcing the issue, she had suggested remaining after the others' departure.

But her little ruse had fallen flat. The man had cannily surmised that he was being angled for, and with the perverseness of all his sex, had grown wary.

Meantime, her companion was also earnestly cogitating. He could not realize how things had come to such a pass. He had invited Miss Renfro to accompany him to this picnic with the specific intention of asking her to become his wife, and he could not understand, in the least, why he had hesitated to offer himself when her actions had so openly informed him that he would not sue in vain.

Leona Renfro was undoubtedly the most sought-after girl in the smart set of which they were both members. She was an only child of wealthy, influential parents, a stunning dresser—almost too ultra-modern to suit his more quiet taste, though he had to admit that she always presented a most striking appearance. But hang it all, he could not be quite certain that he loved her!

He was jostled from his reverie, as one of the wheels dropped into a rut, by a terrific report. Miss Renfro breathed a disappointed sigh, while her companion hastily brought the roadster to a standstill.

"Blow-out," he explained, laconically, as he stepped from the car. "It won't take but a few minutes to remedy it."

He took a hurried survey of their surroundings. In the west, the clouds continued to marshal their forces, and although they were not approaching with a great deal of speed, they moved with the surety of a nemesis.

A little to the rear of the stalled car an old, weatherbeaten farmhouse nestled back from the highway, in a grove of magnificent elms. Just at hand, upon a sloping hillside, was an apple orchard. Even as he gazed, a slender youth in overalls and hickory hat, carrying a pitchfork in one hand, and holding a straining dog in leash by a chain, with the other, came crashing through the orchard, lightly vaulted the old-time zigzag rail fence, and approached the disabled car.

As the figure drew nearer, the young man muttered: "Gee whiz!" while Miss Renfro murmured: "The idea!" acidly.

Beneath the newcomer's jagged-edged hat brim, masses of brown ringlets framed the exquisite, flower-like face of the girl! And a clear, girlish voice exulted: "Oh, I'm so glad you're a man! I was scared to death for fear you might prove to be a woman!"

The man whistled softly, while Miss Renfro reiterated: "The idea!" Her voice by this time being so near frozen it very nearly refused to articulate. Gazing curiously at the girl, the man questioned, dryly: "What's the idea?"

"Why, you see," she explained, eagerly, "we're short a hand in the hayfield. There's a storm coming up, and we've just got to get that hay loaded and into the barn before it begins to rain. We were getting along dandy—Bill Stevens, daddy and I—until daddy fell and sprained his ankle. After that, just we two couldn't make much headway, so I told Bill I'd waylay the first man that passed and get him to help us.

"I knew there would be one any minute, but I couldn't waste time standing idly about, so I planted a nail in a board and placed it in that rut. I knew you couldn't get around that rut," she finished, with an air of triumph.

"What?" Miss Renfro fairly shrieked, while the man's eyes darkened, wrathfully.

"And you placed that nail there, deliberately?" he demanded, indignantly.

"Of course," she admitted, impatiently, as though amazed that anyone could appear so dense. "What else was there to do?"

The man laughed, scornfully. "Very pretty," he acknowledged, coldly, "and of course you expected that to make a hit with the luckless victim? It's really deplorable that I can't see my way clear to coming to the aid of beauty in distress! But you see my first thought must be for Miss Renfro. It's necessary that I get her safely home before this storm overtakes us. Sorry," and the man turned, unconcernedly to reach for an extra tire.

"Stop!" the girl's voice cut in, crisp, commanding. "Possibly, Wolf may have something to do about that."

The man turned, in surprise. He had been so engrossed with the girl, herself, that he had paid scant attention to her four-footed companion.

Now, he noted that the dog was large and gaunt, of a greyish color, and its fierce, red eyes were not at all prepossessing. The snarling brute's powerful jaws were open, revealing sharp, wolfish fangs. Consternation was depicted in the man's eyes as he turned to the girl.

She faced him, defiantly, the pretty eyes hard and determined, and the red lips compressed. She reminded him of a rebellious child, and he was wise enough to realize that she had worked herself into such a strait that she would act with the reckless abandon of a child if he refused to do as she requested.

"Very well," he agreed, grimly, "if nothing else will do, I'll give it a try. I warn you, however, I know as much about haying as the man in the moon. I suppose Miss Renfro will be at liberty to go to the house, Miss——?"

"Helen Clare Fane," supplied the girl, graciously. "Yes, indeed, I want the young lady to make herself at home. There's a comfortable rocker on the sun porch, with several late magazines."

"I see myself!" declined that greatly outraged young lady, with stinging hauteur.

"Oh, but I say, Leona, don't be contrary. You know I shall feel worried about you if I have to leave you out here in the car," the man expostulated. "Beside," after a hurried survey of the threatening sky, "from the look of that cloud, I am afraid we are in for a severe electrical storm."

"Oh, don't bother about me," exclaimed the girl, pettishly. "Anyway, what do you care? All you think about is your own comfort!" She had the grace to flush, under his steady look, and to relieve herself of her discomfiture, cast a spiteful glance at the slight, overall-clad figure, as she continued: "Beside, that dilapidated shack doesn't appear very inviting!"

The man found himself blushing for his companion, as he glanced apologetically toward the quiet figure. The girl, however, didn't appear in the least embarrassed.

"It isn't much for looks," she admitted, with a light laugh, "but it will appeal to you more strongly after the storm breaks. Come, Mister Man, we must get to work."

"Brazen creature!" pronounced Miss Renfro, sotto voce.

"In a minute," he replied, coolly. "I'd better drive this car over under the lee of that hill," suiting the action to the words by climbing into the car and pressing the starter. Having gained the desired position, he put up the storm curtains, and then declared himself ready to "play the game."

As the two were traversing the orchard, Helen Clare glanced up at the tall young man beside her and murmured contritely: "I'm sorry I had to act in such an unconventional manner, but it was really and truly necessary. I——"

"Don't apologize, I beg of you," he interrupted, in a mocking tone. The girl's color rose high.

"Of course, you think I'm silly and bold and unlady-like?" she questioned, in a tone that obviously pleaded for contradiction. The man remained exasperatingly silent. Helen Clare's quick temper flared up.

"I don't give a continental what you think! So there!"

When they came into view of the hayfield, the girl turned to her companion again, and with painful hesitation said: "You are a gentleman, I know, so I am going to ask a favor of you."

The man glanced down at her, with a provoking smile. "Why request? 'Tis yours to command," he teased. "If I refuse, there is always Wolf to enforce your orders!" The girl bit her red lip, but refused to be again angered.

"I want you to promise you'll not tell Bill I forced you to stay," she urged, anxiously. "Just pretend that you were quite willing, won't you? You see, Bill might tell daddy, and I'd sure enough catch it."

The man laughed until he came near strangling, in his excess of mirth. Then, partially sobering, as he gazed into the girl's chagrined eyes, and murmured, ironically: "Please forgive me. Certainly, I'll endeavor to conduct myself in such a manner that he'll think my one, cherished, lifelong dream has at last been realized. I assure you that the very last thing I contemplated was confiding in Bill! But aren't you afraid Miss Renfro may not prove quite so considerate?" The girl tossed her head, unconcernedly.

"As to that," she said, "I'm sure Miss Renfro wouldn't belittle herself by talking upon terms of intimacy with common farm folks!"

The man's eyes glowed, in appreciation of the girl's discernment.

When they came to where Bill Stevens was loading hay, Helen Clare merely said: "Bill, this gentleman has kindly consented to help us. And Bill mumbled: "All right, ma'am." The man gave him one keen look and promptly lost interest. For Bill was just a typical farm hand of uncertain age and colorless exterior.

Then Helen Clare questioned, in a cautious aside: "Can you drive a team, Mister Man?"

"What are you going to do?" he retorted, suspiciously.

"Oh, I'll stack on the wagon, and Bill can pitch," she confided, in an off-hand manner.

"I'll be darned if you do! Give me that fork. Drive the horses, yourself," he exclaimed, masterfully.

Helen Clare meekly obeyed. Then, securing Wolf to the limb of an apple tree, at the edge of the orchard, she returned to her companions. The man courteously assisted her upon the hayrack, and himself followed with the pitchfork.

Meantime, the storm was almost upon them, and the two men toiled tirelessly. The city man, unused to manual labor, found perspiration starting out from every pore, and grimly wondered how Miss Renfro would receive his wilted collar and soiled linen!

They had just started in on the last windrow when Helen Clare gave vent to a cry of dismay. The man turned, in consternation. "What is it?" he ejaculated.

"See," wailed Helen Clare, in great agitation, pointing toward the orchard. "Wolf has broken loose. He has deserted me!" The man looked, barely in sufficient time to see a white and gray ball of fuzz, pursued by a great, gaunt streak of a dog, disappear into a blackberry thicket.

"Why, he's just after a rabbit—what harm?" he questioned, in a puzzled manner. The girl turned quickly.

"Who's going to guard you?" she queried. The man laughed, shortly.

"What makes you think I'll bear watching?" he countered. Before the girl could reply, there came a dazzling, zigzag flash of lightning, with the resultant deafening crash of thunder. The horses plunged and cowered. The man turned to Helen Clare.

"Get Miss Renfro and take her to the house," he ordered. The girl obediently departed. A moment more, and she returned.

"Miss Renfro has already sought shelter in the house," she explained.

"Go right back yourself," he commanded, sternly. But Helen Clare refused. "I'll stay until we have finished," she insisted.

It had grown almost dark by this time. The lightning flashes became more frequent, more vivid; the crashes louder, more terrifying. But the three worked on, tirelessly, undismayed.

Just as Bill pitched the last fork of hay upon the load and threw the fork after it, came a blinding flash, followed by a violent crash and splintering of wood. The man and the girl crouched together on top of the hay, while the horses were thrown back upon their haunches. Poor Bill fairly spun around and around, like a whirligig.

When they came to themselves they gasped in horror. Merely a few yards distant, in the adjoining pasture, a monster cottonwood stood shattered. One whole side had been stripped of bark and limbs.

"Stop!" the girl's voice cut in. "Possibly Wolf may have something to do about that."

Bill leaped forward, and grabbing the now plunging horses by the bits, began staggering toward the barn. Leaving the loaded hayrack in the driveway which ran through the center of the ramshackle old barn, they hurried to the house. It started to rain just as they reached the enclosure surrounding the house, and five mintues after gaining the shelter of the abode, the barn was not discernible through the dense sheets of driving rain.

They entered through the dining-room, and the man gazed about him, curiously. Everything was neat and clean, but showed a painful lack of affluence. An elderly man, with a wholesome affable countenance, was reclining on a couch near the window, and Helen Clare advanced toward him, saying: "Daddy, this Mister ——?" she looked inquiringly at the man.

"Steele——"

"Glad to see you, Mister Steele," the old gentleman cut in, abruptly, extending his hand. The younger man grasped the outstretched hand, shaking it warmly.

"Mister Steele helped us save our hay, daddy," the girl explained, softly.

"We are certainly indebted to you, sir," Mr. Fane acknowledged, with deep feeling.

"It was nothing muttered the thoroughly penitent young man. Then a clear, stinging, feminine voice interrupted: "If you're not too busy, Steele, would you mind telling me how soon we will be able to get away from this horrid place?"

Miss Renfro stood in the doorway leading into a small, stuffy living-room, a colorful bit of loveliness in her filmy green draperies, and "crowning glory" of gold hair. And the man, who had an artistic mind, thought how she resembled a beautiful painting in a dingy setting. But there was no warmth in the dark eyes that looked into hers.

"I beg your pardon, Leona, but I did not notice you standing there. We'll start just as soon as the brunt of the storm has passed."

Helen Clare had slipped away to the kitchen, and Miss Renfro now returned to the living-room, expecting the man to follow her. But the man did not follow. Turning to his host, with a great show of innocence, he remarked: "I'd like to wash up a bit."

"Certainly," was the prompt rejoinder, "go right out in the kitchen. Helen Clare will see to your wants." The man did not wait to be urged.

As he stepped into the bare little kitchen, the girl glanced over her shoulder from the table where she was working. She had slipped on a prim, checked little bungalow apron which covered her boyish apparel, and had it not been for the riotous curls would have presented quite a Quakerish appearance.

"Yes," the man thought, "she was decidedly pretty." He could imagine how altogether charming she would look in one of those delicate, filmy creations that Agnes Renfro always affected.

Helen Clare gave him a quick, frank smile. "You wished something?"

"If you please. Where can I find water and soap?"

"Over there." She pointed a floury finger (she was making biscuit) to where a tin basin and water pail were setting on a bench.

After the man had performed his ablutions, Helen Clare brought the teakettle over and filled it from the bucket. When she started to raise the kettle from the bench, the man took it from her hand. He set it hastily upon the stove, making a wry face, and blowing upon his open palm.

"Oh, what have you done?" she cried anxiously.

"I guess I blistered my hand, handling that pitchfork," he confessed, shamefacedly.

"Oh, I'm so sorry," and she hastened to a cupboard and was back in an instant, with salve and bandages.

"It's nothing," he reassured, lightly.

"Oh, but it is," she insisted. With quick dexterity and gentleness she proceeded to bind up the wounded member. Toward the last she grew self-conscious. Her own hands were browned, and the finger-tips roughened with work. The man's hands were much whiter, and his nails far better cared for than her own. With quick shame she placed both hands behind her. The man smiled.

"'Beautiful hands are those that do deeds that are noble, kind and true,'" he quoted softly. Then he went to Miss Renfro.

Helen Clare soon had the meal prepared, and on the table,, and was graciously inviting her guests out into the dining-room.

"I thank you—no," declined Miss Renfro, icily. Helen Clare flushed, unhappily, while the man stared at his companion, aghast.

"Oh, but I say, Leona, you'll wound Miss Fane's feelings," he remonstrated, strenuously.

"Indeed? And why should I consider her feelings, pray?" she murmured, sarcastically. It was now the man's turn to look confused.

"Come, Leona," he urged, diplomatically, "you are really in need of food. You are all worn out." She gave him a chilly little smile. "No," she refused, positively.

"Then you'll pardon me," he muttered, crossly. "I'm hungry as a bear!"

The man assisted Mr. Fane to the table, Bill was called in, and they were soon making merry over as dainty an impromptu repast as a hungry man could possibly wish for.

There were flaky, golden-brown biscuits, creamed potatoes, home-smoked ham, tomatoes and cucumbers from the garden, jellies and pickled peaches; real "honest-to-goodness" butter, and great goblets of rich, sweet milk. And the man had never come as near letting his appetite get the better of him in all his well-trained life.

But the meal passed all too quickly, and the man could think of no further excuse for prolonging his stay, so, informing Miss Renfro that he was going down to put on a tire, and would return for her, he stepped outdoors.

The storm had passed on to the northeast, though distant sound of cannonading was still borne faintly to his ear. The sky was leaden and overcast. There would be no moon.

The door behind him hastily opened and closed, emitting Helen Clare. "Wait, Mister Man," she said in a guarded whisper, "here's a lantern. Beside, I wanted to tell you something." He turned quickly. She came close to his side, her face barely discernible in the semi-gloom.

"I want you to know that I wouldn't have acted in such a hoydenish manner his afternoon," she hurried on, "if it hadn't been so urgent. You see, there is a buyer coming to pay us for that hay in the morning. And a mortgage falls due on our farm tomorrow. Can't you see? It was the last day, and we would have lost our home if we had lost our hay—that's all," she finished, desperately.

"But surely, no man would be heartless enough to foreclose, under the circumstances," he said.

"Oh, but wouldn't they?" she exclaimed, indignantly. "Why, daddy says that all lawyers are heartless. They have to be, in their profession."

"Who holds the mortgage?" he asked, quickly.

"Mr. Hartwell, an Eastern millionaire. John Amos did act as his agent in Miami, but he was recalled a couple of months ago, for some reason, and a lawyer by the name of Bennett was sent to take his place."

"Oh, well," the man laughed, light-heartedly, "you won't need to fear him any more. We 'made hay while the sun shone!'"

The following afternoon, Helen Clare, looking very dainty and sweet in a simple muslin frock and white leghorn hat, was decorously driving old Dobbin along the country road toward Miami. "Maybe"—she thought, with a little thrill—"maybe she would get a glimpse of Mr. Man on the streets of Miami. Of course, the beautiful, haughty young lady in the lovely green frock was probably his fiancee. But then—— Oh, well, there was no harm in just looking at him!"

Arrived in town, she sought out the Berkeley building, in which the lawyer's office was located, and informed the office boy that she wished to see Mr. Bennett upon a matter of importance.

The lawyer was stooping over some papers on his desk when she entered, and it was several moments before he turned and faced her. As he did so, the girl uttered a startled cry.

"Mr. Steele!" she gasped.

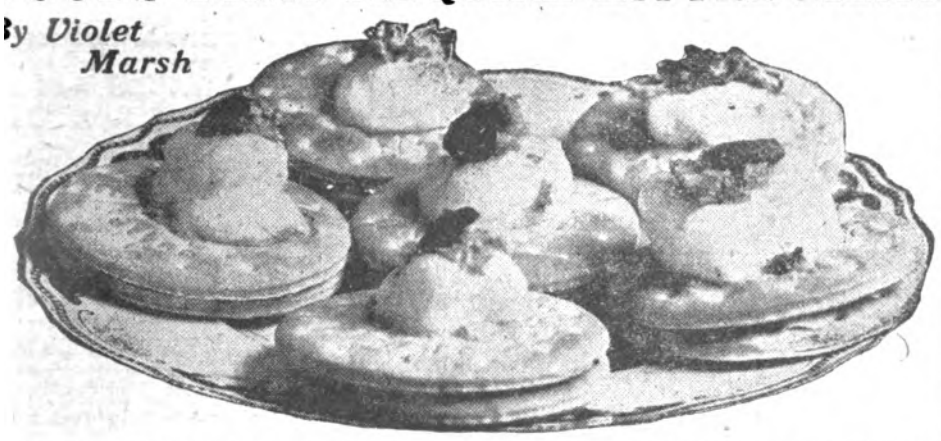
"Steele Bennett," he smiled.

Their business negotiations were soon and favorably transacted, and the young lawyer was gallantly escorting his fair visitor to the door.

"I am very sorry, Miss Fane," he was saying, in his most professionally lawyer-like manner, "that your father holds such an erroneous impression concerning lawyers in general. Now, I would like an opportunity of proving to him that one lawyer, in particular, is trying to be 'on the square.' If"—boldly angling for an invitation—"if you could just see your way clear to asking me out to Sunday night dinner?"

Steele Bennett had been considered a very brilliant lawyer, in Eastern circles, with the reputation of winning very nearly every case he pitted his wits against.

And with such a man back of him, it's quite likely he won his point in this instance.



Farmer Jones was on his way home from town when he thought he had forgotten something. Twice on the way he stopped and looked over the packages in the wagon and searched his pocketbook, but decided he had everything with him.

When he reached home his daughter came running out, and with a surprised look on her face said: "Why, father, where's mother?"—Ladies' Home Journal.

FOODS THAT REQUIRE LITTLE HEAT

By Violet Marsh

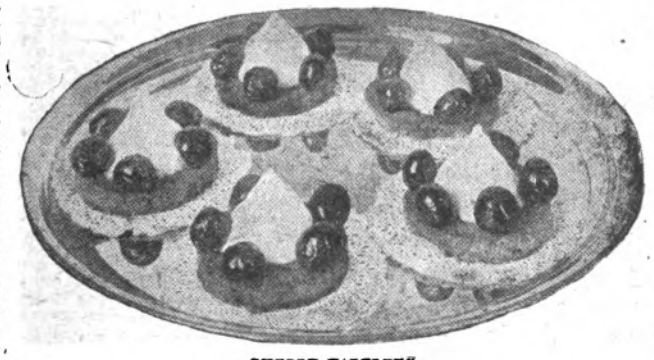
Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THERE is no other single article of food that is so frequently placed on the table or takes so prominent a place in the average diet as bread. For this reason the bread supply should never be allowed to get low in hot weather, r, properly balanced with butter, milk, fruits, getables both leafy and fleshy, eggs or cheese, licious meals may be prepared with little or no e. The addition of a few nuts, raisins or dates res variety and makes the everyday loaf someing a little out of the usual. Raisin brownead sliced thin, buttered and then generously read with cream cheese, makes a sandwich fit r a king.

Another food, highly valuable in summer, is e banana. Many people seem content to eat nanas as soon as they have turned yellow, not alizing they should be of a golden hue and beme specked with shades of brown before they e fully ripe, or have developed their highest atent of nourishment. An underripe banana difficult of gestion beuse it conins an excess starch, but ich will turn soluble sugar d become distible if alved to fully en. Being h in fats, oteid carbodrates and neral salts, banana is a lued food in Tropical climates to which is native, and not only en raw but oked in a vaty of ways. that your ocer does not cut back into the end of the nanas when you buy them, for if this wonderwrapping which nature has provided is once oken, the contents will quickly spoil, and if derripe will never reach a state of perfection. ays of cooking bananas are given in this article.

oling Drinks that the Men in the Fields Will Like

A vote of thanks is coming to anyone who l take to the out-of-door workers a can of cool, reshing drink, which if lightly nourishing will all the more appreciated. Practically all such erages can be prepared in the cool of the ly morning and put on the cellar bottom or the ice-box until needed. A few hours in ich to "age" improves them.

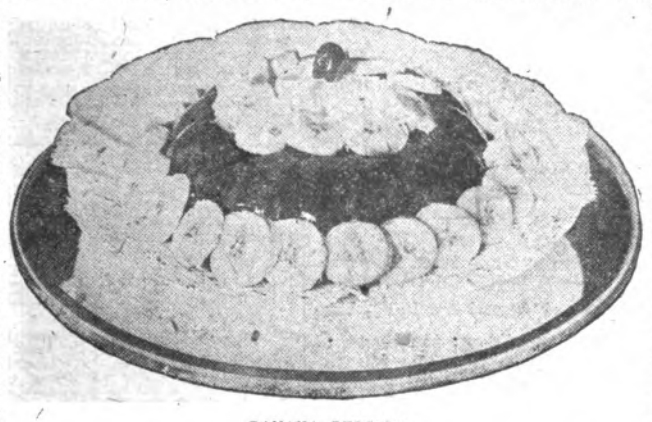


As sugar must be added to most beverages, the t results are obtained by using it in the form a syrup. It is also the most economical. Boil parts sugar to one of water for five minutes er it begins boil, then ur into ss jars for ure use.

s lemonade always ap ceptable ak in hot ather, it is l to pre- e in adce so that may be ckly made m lemon ip in case h lemons not at hand. Boil for five minutes two cups a half of sugar with two cups of water, n add the grated rind of two lemons and the e of twelve. Stir thoroughly, fill small glass s, partly seal and cook five minutes in hotter bath. Seal.

FRUIT VINEGARS make delicious thirst quenchthat are prepared with a small amount of or. Crush eight quarts of any kind of juicy ries, cherries or sweet plums and put them in a stone jar. Stir in three pints of good cider egar and let it remain undisturbed three days a cool cellar. Strain, and to each pint of e add a pint of sugar. Heat in the open tle only long enough to dissolve the sugar, n pour into glass jars and cook five minutes er the water begins to boil. Seal. Dilute to e when served.

Water sweetened with good molasses and flaed with ground ginger is an old-time drink he hay-fields. A refreshing drink that "stays" stomach as well, is made as follows: Put e heaping tablespoons of rolled oats into e pints of cold water and slowly cook one r. Strain ough a fine e. Stir one nding tableon of ground, ger with two s of brown ar and simfive minutes one quart of ling water. en cold pour the syrup n the ginger ch will have led in the tom. Add strained meal water the ginger up, also a ch of salt the juice of lemons. A it vinegar r be substied for the ons. Stir all ether and dilute with water to taste. Serve cold.



Another nourishing drink is made by breaking eggs into a quart preserving jar with one and alf cup of lemon syrup and one level teaspoon grated nutmeg. Put on the rubber and jar r and shake well. Add three quarts of water, nough to make the desired amount.

CHERRY TARTLETS.

SPANISH STEAK.

BANANA PUDDING.

BUTTERMILK LEMONADE is made by adding to each quart of buttermilk about eight tablespoons of lemon juice and four of sugar. Whey from cheese making also makes a valuable drink. Use about six tablespoons of sugar and the juice of two lemons to the quart. Flavor with a little nutmeg or cinnamon.

Preparing Tomatoes for Winter Use

CANNED WHOLE TOMATOES.—Wipe and cut up some tomatoes and boil twenty minutes. Remove them from the fire and run through a strainer. Return the strained liquid to the fire. Have selected some small well-ripened tomatoes that will go into the mouth of the jar, dip into boiling water, remove the skins and drop the whole tomatoes into the jar. Add one level teaspoon of salt to each quart, and pour in the strained tomato while boiling, until all the spaces are filled. Put on rubbers and tops and partly seal. Place in the boiler or sterilizer on the false bottom. The water should be hot, coming nearly to the shoulders of the jars. After the water commences to boil hard, cook the tomatoes thirty minutes. Remove from boiler and finish seal. The strained tomato juice may be used for soup, and as the whole tomatoes will keep their shape, they may be used for breading, salads or baking.

TOMATO CATSUP.—One peck of red, ripe tomatoes, cut up and cooked in a preserving kettle until thoroughly done. Mash through a fine sieve. Add eight level tablespoons of salt and one level tablespoon of cayenne pepper. Into a small flannel bag put two level tablespoons of black pepper, six level tablespoons of mustard, one level tablespoon of cinnamon, one tablespoon of unground celery seed, one level tablespoon of unground allspice and one level tablespoon of cloves. Boil very rapidly until the catsup begins to thicken, and add one quart of vinegar and continue boiling until a teaspoon placed in a saucer will not give off any water. Remove the bag of spice, put the catsup into jars or bottles boiling hot, and seal or cork. When bottled, it is well, after corking, to dip the corked end of bottle into hot paraffin.

CHILI SAUCE.—Scald and peel twenty-four ripe tomatoes and chop up with two red bullnose peppers, two green bullnose peppers and two large onions. Put into an enameled preserving kettle and add four cups of vinegar, two cups of brown sugar, two level tablespoons of salt, two level teaspoons each of whole allspice, whole cloves, cinnamon, ground ginger, and ground nutmeg. Boil rapidly until the sauce begins to thicken which will take about one hour. Stir frequently to prevent scorching. Put into wide-mouthed bottles, cork and dip ends of bottles in melted paraffin.

PRESERVED TOMATOES.—Use either the yellow or red, pear or cherry varieties. Other kinds may be used, but these bear abundantly and make a much more attractive preserve. Peel, by first dipping in boiling water, but only a few at a time. Remove the skins carefully so not to break the tomatoes. Weigh them and put into a preserving kettle with as many pounds of sugar as you have of tomatoes. Prepare green ginger root by carefully scraping off all the skin and shaving it into small bits. Add one level teaspoon of these ginger shavings for each two pounds of tomatoes. Let the contents of the kettle come to a boil and then cook ten minutes. Remove the tomatoes from the syrup and spread them upon platters to cool, which will keep them from coming to pieces. When cool, return them to the boiling syrup and gently boil until they are the desired thickness. Put into jars while hot, adding a thick slice of lemon to each jar before sealing.

TOMATO SWEET PICKLE.—Cut four quarts of full-grown green tomatoes into thin slices, sprinkle with one-half cup of table salt and let stand over night. Drain thoroughly through a colander, then add one cup of sliced onion, one quart of shredded tender cabbage, three cups of thinly-sliced green peppers (do not use seeds), two teaspoons of ground ginger, four teaspoons of ground cinnamon, two teaspoons of ground cloves, two teaspoons of ground mustard and two cups of brown sugar. Measure spices in even teaspoons. Add one quart of good vinegar, quickly bring to a boil, stirring frequently, then set back and slowly cook until the cabbage is tender. Too long cooking will injure the flavor.

STRAINED TOMATO.—An excellent way to use small odd lots of very ripe tomatoes is to cut up without peeling and cook rapidly one-half hour, stirring frequently. Strain through a fine sieve, return to fire, bring to a hard boil, and put into jars that have stood in boiling water ten minutes and seal. It is then ready for use when needed for soups, macaroni, sauces or scallops.

A Home-Made Yeast that Will Keep in Summer

A liquid potato yeast can be made which will keep well in any cellar if it is prepared and renewed according to the following directions:

To make four loaves of bread, pare about four medium-sized potatoes, cut them into small pieces and cook them until tender in three-fourths pint of boiling water, then mash them in the water in which they were cooked and add three cups of cold water, four and one-half tablespoons of sugar, six teaspoons of salt, and when the mixture has cooled to lukewarm, add one pint of liquid yeast. Let this mixture stand in a warm place over night, then stir well and pour off one pint and put into a warm place for a few hours, then into a cool place and keep it for use as a "starter" the next time bread is made.

Where there is no liquid yeast for the "starter," proceed as above, using three yeast-cakes softened in two cups of lukewarm water instead of the pint of liquid yeast.

General Recipes

FILLED AND FROSTED CRACKERS.—For a quick warm-weather dessert, thin crackers can be made very delicious in a number of ways. Spread lightly with cheese and oven-toasted is one way, and if a little sweet is desired, add a bit of jelly to the cheese before it is toasted. (See illustrated heading.)

Beaten white of one egg, to which one tablespoon of sugar has been gradually beaten in, one tablespoon of chopped nuts and a little vanilla then added is a delicious combination. Spread on the crackers and toast in a slow oven.

Filled crackers are also delicious but a little more work. Beat the white of one egg until stiff, gradually add three-fourths cup of sugar, then one tablespoon of boiling water and one-fourth teaspoon of vanilla. Add more sugar if necessary. The filling is varied by adding melted chocolate, orange juice instead of hot water, chopped raisins or dates. Spread between or on top of crisp crackers. No cooking.

SPANISH STEAK.—Take a slice of steak two inches thick, the round preferable. Cut off the fat, cover the bottom of the baking dish with it, and lay in the steak. Cover with a layer of carrot, and on top a layer of thinly-sliced potato, sprinkled with flour. Use a light sprinkling of salt to each layer. Dot with butter, cover with milk, and bake in a moderate oven two hours. Pepper and sliced celery may be added if desired. Cover closely while cooking.

CHERRY TARTLETS.—Cut rings of cake one inch thick, slightly scoop out the centers and fill even with stoned and mashed sweet cherries. On each ring place an orange mould, and garnish with stoned cherries. To make the mould, bring to a boil one cup of orange juice and one cup of water. Thicken with three tablespoons of cornstarch wet with a little cold water. Add gradually and cook three minutes after it begins to boil. Add a pinch of salt and sugar to taste. Cook one minute and slowly pour over three egg whites beaten to a foam, constantly beating. Pour into individual moulds.

BANANA PUDDING.—Soak two tablespoons of granulated gelatine in one and one-half cup of strong cold coffee. Add half a cup of sugar and heat until the gelatine is dissolved, stirring constantly. Strain and set to cool, and add one pint of heavy cream, whipped, and one teaspoon of vanilla before the gelatine begins to stiffen. Beat well. Mould. Garnish with bananas cut into rings.

BANANA WITH MARSHMALLOW SAUCE.—Peel, scrape off any loose fiber, and slice well-ripened bananas crosswise. Place in a serving dish. Make a sauce by boiling together for six minutes one cup of sugar and half a cup of water, then beat in one-half pound of cut-up marshmallows. Pour the sauce over the bananas while hot then set away to cool before serving.

BANANA PIE.—Make a custard by scalding one cup of milk, and stirring in one-half cup of sugar thoroughly mixed with two tablespoons of cornstarch. Cook eight minutes, stirring frequently. Beat one-half cup of sugar with the yolks of three eggs, and pour into this the cooked mixture. Stir well, then return to fire and cook two minutes, stirring continually. Set away to cool. Line a deep pie plate with pastry and bake. When cool, fill with sliced bananas and the custard, in alternate layers, squeezing a little lemon juice over each layer of banana. Beat the three egg whites very stiff, and gradually beat in three tablespoons of granulated sugar. Spread over the pie. Garnish with sweet strawberries or cherries.

BANANA CAKE FILLING.—Two ripe bananas mashed through a potato ricer, and mixed with one tablespoon of orange marmalade, one tablespoon of lemon juice and two tablespoons of sugar. Beat well together and spread between layers of cake. Preserved plums or strawberries may be used in place of the orange marmalade.

BANANA SALAD.—Disc ripe bananas, and place in lettuce leaves to form individual portions. Serve with dressing made by bringing to a boil one-fourth cup of pineapple juice, one-fourth cup of orange juice, and one-half lemon. Have all prepared one-fourth cup of sugar and one tablespoon of flour mixed and then wet with three tablespoons of cold water, and into it stir one well-beaten egg. Very gradually add this mixture to the hot fruit juice, and stir until it is thickened and cooked. Set away to cool. When ready to use, fold in one-half cup of whipped cream.

BAKED BANANAS.—The banana may be wiped and baked whole until the steam and heat open the skin. Care must be taken that the banana is intact when cooked this way. Remove from the skin, butter and eat as a vegetable.

Another way is to peel the bananas, scrape, and cut once lengthwise. Sprinkle with sugar (brown is preferable), dot with butter, add a little juice and bake in a fairly hot oven.

CANNED CHERRIES.—The cherries may be pitted or not according to taste. If the stones remain the product will have more of the cherry-bitter flavor, and will require a little more sugar. Fill the jars with cherries, and then with a heavy syrup. Place jars in a hot-water bath and, after the water begins to boil, cook twenty minutes.

CHERRY SYRUP.—Select only ripe and juicy cherries. Use an equal weight of fruit and sugar. Pack into jars in alternating layers until all the fruit and sugar is used. Partly seal and put into hot-water bath with water nearly to the neck of the jars. Boil half an hour, remove jars, pour hot contents into cheese-cloth bags and drain. Return syrup to jars, put them into the hot bath and cook for five minutes after the water boils. Seal. Syrups from any juicy fruits or berries may be prepared in the same way.

CHERRY PIE.—Line a deep pie plate with thinly-rolled pastry that is not too rich. Stone two or more cups of ripe cherries and fill the plate. Mix two tablespoons of flour with one cup of sugar and one-fourth teaspoon of salt, and pour it over the cherries. Dot with butter, wet the edges and cover with pastry. Bake forty-five minutes.

Mike and Pat were visiting a zoo, when they paused before a cage containing a kangaroo. Pat stopped, stared and then nudged Mike.

"Hey, Mike, phwat sort ov animal is thot?"

"That," said Mike, "is a kangaroo."

"A kangaroo is it? Mind the length ov its neck. A kargaroo is it?"

"That's it," answered Mike, "they're natives of Australia——"

"Phwat's thot yer sayin'!" cried the startled Pat, "natives ov Australia! Lord save us, me sister married wan ov thim!"

Stella Rosevelt

her brother to her hotel.

Grace insisted upon remaining through the night with her.

"You are not fit to be left alone, and—I want to stay," she pleaded, as Star hesitated about accepting her offer.

So the two young girls passed the night together, and Star, growing confidential, and feeling that some explanation regarding Josephine's insulting remarks that morning was due her friend, told her much concerning her life, and how it had happened that she was at one time an inmate of Mrs. Richards' family; also relating the events that had transpired since she and Mr. Rosevelt left them, and how she had rescued Josephine from the mad dog.

Star was really ill from nervous prostration the next day, and obliged to keep her room; but Miss Meredith regaled curious ears with the whole story of Josephine Richards' danger and Star's courageous defence of her, and all Newport did indeed "ring" even as she had hoped.

Enough could not be said in admiration of the brave girl, while scorn and contempt were freely expressed for the recipients of so much heroism for refusing to acknowledge their indebtedness, and awarding her the commendation she deserved.

Mr. Rosevelt was even more unnerved, when he learned the truth, than he had been the previous day.

He came to her room, wan and haggard, after talking with Miss Meredith, and sank, weak and trembling, into a chair at her side.

"My child," he said, brokenly, as he took both her hands and looked them carefully over with tear-laden eyes, "are you sure you did not get a scratch anywhere?"

"Quite sure, Uncle Jacob," Star replied, reassuringly.

"But you were in terrible danger. Suppose you had not succeeded in pinning him down, and he had turned upon you?" he said, with a shudder.

"I did not think of that," Star answered; "but if I had known that he would turn upon me, I believe I should have tried to save Josephine just the same. Somebody was in danger of being bitten even if she escaped unharmed, and I felt that I must strain every nerve and not allow him to get among the company. The dog was a tiny little thing," she went on, flushing and becoming excited as she seemed to live over again that dreadful experience; "but, oh, Uncle Jacob, he was terribly strong. I thought once that I should have to let him go I could not have held him one minute longer."

"We must not talk about it any more; it excites you," Mr. Roosevelt said, soothingly; "but the world would have been very dark for me if anything had happened to you; and—I am bitter enough to feel that Josephine Richards' safety is dearly bought, even at the sacrifice of nothing more than your nerves and strength," he concluded, in a stern tone.

Star reached out one white hand and laid it gently upon his, saying, with grave sweetness, while she wiped away her tears:

"Uncle Jacob, let us not judge too harshly nor be unforgiving. 'Charity,' you know, 'suffereth long and is kind, and never faileth.' Surely you would not have had me run away like a coward, and leave her sitting there playing with that mad creature, knowing that she was in such fearful danger?"

"N-o," he admitted, reluctantly.

"Just think," Star went on; "she had him in her lap, and I did not speak one instant too soon, for hardly had I told her that he was mad, when he snapped at her. No; I am glad that I did what was right, and Josephine Richards' life was every bit as precious to me yesterday as that of any one else, and I should have done just the same had she been an enemy a hundred-fold more than she is. She has endeavored to injure me, I know, in every possible way, and, in all the ordinary walks of life, I should let her alone. Her spite and ill-will, however bitter, cannot do me any real harm, although they may annoy me exceedingly, and doubtless will, in the end, rebound upon herself; but I am glad that I did not falter yesterday. I did what I could with the kindest of motives; and if she does not feel that she owes me anything, it cannot alter the fact that I did my duty."

CHAPTER XXX.

"I LOVE HIM STILL."

The first of the week following the events just related, Mrs. Richards and her daughter were suddenly "recalled to Brooklyn."

Newport had become, as Miss Meredith had prophesied, "too hot for them."

They were gone almost before any one knew that they contemplated going; and, it must be confessed, that it was a great relief to both Star and Mr. Rosevelt when they learned of their flitting, and knew they would be obliged to meet them no more.

Star had recovered her usual health and strength, but she had suffered such a shock that she could not meet or see a dog without a feeling of fear and an almost overpowering weakness, and she never entirely outgrew this feeling during her life.

She had seemed unusually thoughtful, too, since the event. Most people, noticing it, thought it but natural, considering the fearful danger she had been in, but Star had a very different reason for it.

The moment she had returned to consciousness and found herself in Ralph Meredith's arms, seen his agonized looks, heard his tones of fear, realized the passionate, though trembling, clasp in which she was held, the terrible throbbings of his heart as she lay against it, and noted the quiver of his pale lips as he hung over her and begged her to assure him that she was unharmed, she knew that he was no longer what she had hitherto regarded him—merely a kind and congenial friend.

Those signs she had interpreted in a way to make her feel very grave and deeply troubled.

She felt that he regarded her with feelings which she knew it would be impossible for her ever to return, and she feared he was cherishing hopes which, if not "nipped in the bud," might ruin his whole life.

His every look and act since that day had told her as plainly as words could have done that he loved her, and she was constantly trying to think of some way to make him discover how hopeless his passion was without bringing matters to a crisis.

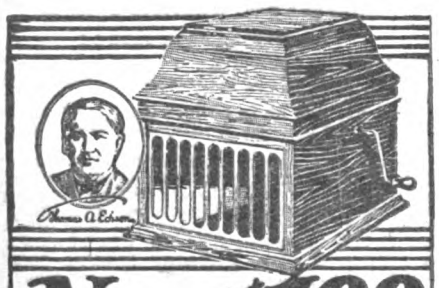
One evening they all went for a walk in the park, where they spent an hour listening to the music and strolling about.

As they were returning, Ralph succeeded in securing Star as a companion; perchance his sister knew his design in so doing, and aided him by asking Mr. Rosevelt for his arm and making herself as agreeable as she could to him.

"Come this way," Ralph whispered, leading the fair girl down a path at right angles to the one they had been traversing; "we shall all meet at the gate;" and Star could find no reasonable excuse to offer, although her heart beat ominously at the request.

"Miss Gladstone," he said, abruptly, after a rather awkward silence, "I am obliged to return to New York tomorrow."

"Are you?" Star asked in surprise. "Is it not a sudden departure?"



"Rather. I had hoped to remain a week longer."

"Surely your sister does not accompany you? I should miss her sorely; I should regret to lose her more than I can tell you."

The young man's face fell. He had not been included in her regret. But he rallied, and said, lightly:

"My sister is highly favored, Miss Gladstone;

Women in Business

By Frances L. Garside

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE Guaranty Trust Company of New York employs hundreds of women and for a number of years Miss Eugenia Wallace was engaged to hire them. In this way she learned to read character and as practice made her proficient it developed in time that she never, in her placing of employes, tried to make a round peg fit a square hole.

She became such an authority that she was given the position of vocational adviser and head of the Employment Department of the Central Y. W. C. A. Here she comes in contact with hundreds of women every month, some making good, many attaining a proficiency that is amazing, and others making a failure. It is her opinion that women are in business pursuits to stay, and that it is up to them to grow so proficient that their employers will give them the recognition they deserve.

Training, of course, is necessary. "This statement," says Miss Wallace, "should carry no discouragement to the girl or woman who has, by social position, or lack of means, been denied training. I do not mean training in a college or a business school. Both are good; but there comes a training by application and using good common sense.

"The college woman and the woman who has lived entirely within the walls of her home, start out together. The former has the advantage, though not entirely because of her valuable 'book learning,' but because of the knowledge of how to mingle with others, to conduct affairs with them, and still to retain her own personality.

"The woman accustomed to the detail of a neighborhood and home carries that bit of provincialism to the office with her. In the past if she were ill-treated, or snubbed, or her rights in any way imposed upon, she thereafter didn't 'speak' to the offender. In business life, if she wishes to be a success, she must continue to speak, and she shows a broad vision if she speaks more pleasantly than before. I do not mean that she must become a doormat in business, as I hear the home-bodies charging; I mean that she must rise above all personal differences, all petty tricks and slaps, and go on smiling no matter what happens. She never knows in business how soon a liability may become an asset. In other words, she must put away all personal sensitiveness and cultivate the feeling of impersonality.

"There are many difficulties to be faced in the development of the modern business woman. They arise both from her own conception of the work before her and from the attitude of her employer. She is really a pioneer, and she must expect that she will have to break down some barriers in the minds of the business men. They exist because in some cases the work of women has demanded criticism, and in other cases because the business man has been more or less skeptical about the actual existence of feminine abilities.

"Women," continued Miss Wallace with a sigh, "are either inclined to be overcome with a deep feeling of fear, or they are too positive and assured about the points which they do not fully understand. To the first class belong those women who think the heavens will fall if they attempt anything new.

"Why, they keep on addressing envelopes all their lives because they are afraid that if they undertook more responsible duties they might make a mistake. Then to the other class belong those who are over-confident of their abilities. They are the greatest menace to the entire-woman-in-business movements, and they need to find a balance in experience. They are a nuisance and the men are the first to discover the fact.

"As long as women are confined to the clerical labors of a business they are endlessly confronted with some such argument as this: 'Your department costs a great deal but brings in nothing. We cannot afford to add to the expense.' This is always the cry in a non-productive position, and it demonstrates the fact that women must reach out toward positions which are more lucrative because they bring more business in to the firm. Here, again, is where the woman who is mentally and physically upset by the slightest change on her routine in her home, finds it a handicap to branch out in something new in business. She is of the class that is apt to continue addressing envelopes. She hasn't initiative.

The women lack originality in business. They are too prone to follow the track that is already laid down. They are too afraid to branch out in any new direction, taking certain chances, with the possibility of proving that they are right, and of increasing their value because they have discovered something new.

"The woman over forty who is coming into business for the first time is the great problem to employment agencies. She is prone to say: 'I could take an executive position, I know. I was head of our neighborhood Red Cross and we did wonderful work,' etc., etc. She doesn't realize that to be an executive in business she must know someting about that business.

"When the women in this class are prepared to start in at a beginner's wage, and when they prepare in themselves an open-minded point of view, they can be placed somewhere in social work where there are real opportunities for advancement. However, there is often a long trail of education to be accomplished before they can even conceive the situation before them, and there are so few places where they can acquire the education without actual hard knocks."

Love Will Find the Way

Then she stepped back, with picturesque grace, and laughed lightly.

"Upon my word, one would think that this was a funeral! I never saw two such lugubrious countenances!" she exclaimed. "I am going out for a few moments now, and I command you both to be in the greatest possible spirits on my return, under penalty of—well, of my most severe displeasure. No, you are not going with me, Marian. I have something to which I must attend first. I won't submit to the indignity of having either of you think that I am heartbroken; and that I shall be, if I do not find you radiantly happy on my return. Half an hour, remember, is all that I shall allow you, and I shall expect to find you both here upon my return."

She went out and left them. The smile had faded from her lips before the door was reached; but her face was hidden from them and they did not know. A sudden blindness came over her as she reached the outer door, and she would have fallen but that he who was ever ready when he was needed was at hand—Frederick Underwood.

He, and he alone, understood. He slipped his arm about her waist and led her into a deserted room, placing her with the tenderness of a woman, upon a chair; then he returned and closed the door.

June had drawn Marian more closely to him. She was sobbing, and there were tears upon her cheeks, but he kissed them all away.

"Sweetheart," he whispered, "this is not the time to weep. Surely we have wept enough. Is my love so little to you, darling?"

"It is more than life, June," she answered, "and for that reason I can guess something of what this has cost her. Oh, June! what do I not owe her?"

"It is something of which we cannot speak, my darling," he answered simply. "We can only accept the situation as it stands. Let us thank God that the barrier to our union has been removed, and accept the blessing that He has sent in gratitude, and not with comment. Oh, love, I can think of nothing save that you are mine!"

She kissed him of her own will.

"And you love me so well that you can forget everything for my sake? You can overlook the prejudice of years? You can forget that my mother——"

"Hush, sweet! I can forget everything, save that I love you. I love you! My love will save you from every blight that could fall upon your life. Marian, my wife!"

"Dearest heart," she whispered, "how happy I am to tell you that it was all a hideous fraud that was put upon me! How happy I am to tell you that my parentage is equal to your own! How glad I am to have you know that, so far from being insane, my mother has had sufficient to drive a thousand women mad, and yet retains her perfect reason! Oh, June, June! listen while I tell of all the happiness that has come to me within these few days! God has sent me all—all, and more than I could ever have asked; and He has crowned it with your love, my darling. I have nothing left to ask; my happiness is absolute!"

CHAPTER XXXVI.

UNDERWOOD'S NOBLENESS.

Very slowly, half-hesitatingly, as if he scarcely knew whether to speak or remain silent, Underwood approached Anne Gordon. He stood beside her for a moment and looked down upon her; then he leaned his elbow upon the mantelshelf, as if for a better curb on his emotions, before he allowed himself to speak to her.

She glanced up, and a weary, weak sort of a smile played upon her white features that seemed to madden him; but he did not lose his self-control.

"You know?" he asked gently.

"Yes," she answered. "I have concealed my weakness from—them, but to you, at least, I can be—natural. How much one appreciates a true, disinterested friendship, under circumstances like these."

Underwood winced. There was a little uncomfortable silence; then, with suspicious deliberation, he drew up a chair and sat down beside her, taking the end of a ribbon on her gown in his hand and pulling at it nervously.

She had leaned back in her chair and closed her eyes; but she felt his presence, and after a little time she put out her cold fingers and touched his hand.

"It is only for a little while," she said, almost feebly. "I shall be myself again in a moment, and you will bear it, will you not?"

His warm hand closed over hers with inspiring strength.

"Forever, if you will," he answered dully. "You must not think that because I am a man I cannot indulge your weakness. I know what it is; for I, too, have suffered."

"You?"

She opened her eyes and looked at him, forgetful of herself, as usual.

"Yes. I have loved—hopelessly. I have loved an angel. She is without flaw or blemish, and as far above me as the stars are. My grief is not loud in its lamentation, because I have grown up with the thought of her indifference. There has never been a time when there was the slightest hope for me. I have even ceased to ask for love; but oh! Anne, if she would but let me be her friend; if she would but allow me to see her heart, and prove that the devotion, of which we have read of past ages, is not dead, but still lives in pure souls, I should be so content.

"I could not accept that friendship without her knowledge of my presumption, because I should always feel that I was not honest; but after knowing, if she would but trust me, if she would but give me her confidence, and let me help bear her burdens, I would be the most loyal friend, the most unselfish, the most uncomplaining. Dear, do you think that she will send me from her? Do you think she will forbid me her presence eternally? Do you think that, because I have dared to love her, she will banish me forever?"

He did not lift his eyes, because he knew that she was looking at him. He could feel her astonishment in the trembling of the hand he held. He knew that she understood him by the unbroken silence that followed his words. And then she drew her hand from him, and he was startled by the sound of a little sob.

He aroused himself almost violently, and a swift flush burned in his cheeks. He slipped to his knees beside her, and, putting both hands about her waist, he dropped his head in her lap.

"Can you find no forgiveness—no pity for me?" he asked. "Does your own suffering suggest no compassion for mine?"

She did not reply at once, but he felt her tender hand on his hair, and then her fingers touched his cheek.

"How can I thank you?" she whispered. "You talk of forgiveness, and yet you have given me that for which my hungry heart was yearning—companionship."

He lifted his head and caught her hand, kissing it passionately.

"Thank you, a thousand times; ten thousand times!" he whispered. "I may speak this time, may I not? I swear to you that after that I will remain silent until you take the seal from my lips. I swear to you that no word of love shall be spoken, until you come to me of your own accord, and tell me that at last my devotion has met with its reward, and if that time never comes, that I shall not complain, but be grateful to the end of my life that you have given me all you had to give—your friendship.

"But you will let me tell you this time, will you not? You will let me speak those words which I thought would remain forever unspoken by my lips—that I love you! You will let me tell you of my undying devotion? Oh, Anne, darling, darling, my whole life, and heart, and soul are yours. I love you so that I feel myself capable of asking you nothing in return, but only your toleration, to be allowed to be near you. Don't let me offend you, dear, but command me to be silent, and I shall obey."

There was a depth of passion in his words, a wealth of devotion that touched her to the soul. She recalled the words that had been spoken to her by June Beckwith, and mentally compared that scene with this. She realized in the depths of her soul that June Beckwith was not comparable to this man; that Underwood's was the greater nature, that Underwood's was the stronger manhood, that Underwood was capable of a self-sacrifice of which Junius Beckwith would never have dreamed; and yet, with the perversity of womanhood, she loved June Beckwith, and she did not love this man whose strength and generosity appealed to all that was noblest and best within her.

And yet she was proud of his love. It seemed to take from her heart all the sting of that other humiliation, and it was with the deepest gratitude that she leaned forward and placed her cheek against Underwood's brow for just a moment.

"Will you think me very weak when I thank you for your words?" she asked. "Will you cease to care for a woman so light of soul when I tell you that no consolation you could have offered me would have equalled this? Oh, it is so sweet to an aching heart to know that it is not alone in its sorrow! You cannot expect me to regret your love, even for your sake, when it is like balm to my heart. Walt," as she saw him about to speak; "you must not misunderstand me. I would be worse than cruel were I to say that there is any love in my heart to give you in return. There is not. I loved—him. I don't know when I grew to love him, nor why; but the fact remains the same, and my soul is too sore to even understand it all yet. I would not allow them to suspect it, for fear of spoiling one ray of their happiness together; for I speak the truth when I tell you that I would not rob them of it if I could. But—there has come—a second love into a bruised life, Fred."

He drew her to him and kissed her reverently, not passionately.

"Thank you for those words!" he said, with bowed head, scarcely above a whisper. "Jacob did not serve more faithfully for Rachel than shall I for you. And why not? Is not the promised reward infinite?"

"And if that time ever comes, should you be content to be the second?"

"More than content. I know your noble nature too well to think that you would insult the magnitude of my love by offering it less than that which you have already known. I trust you implicitly, Anne."

* * * * * * *

Who was it that warned Paul Reade of his danger?

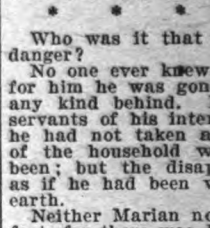
No one ever knew. When they went to look for him he was gone, without leaving trace of any kind behind. He had not even told the servants of his intended departure from home; he had not taken any clothes, and everything of the household was left exactly as it had been; but the disappearance was as complete as if he had been wiped from the face of the earth.

Neither Marian nor her mother regretted the fact, for there was his mother to be considered, she from whom Marion had known nothing but tenderness and love during all the years of her lonely young life.

And both Marian and her mother repay that love amply. Nothing is ever said in Janet Reade's presence whereby the sin of her son can be brought to her mind. In her old days she sees nothing but love and happiness about her; and if her own life is shadowed by the knowledge of what her son cost both those unselfish women, she endeavors to conceal it and share in their contentment.

June would not listen to a postponement of their marriage, but less than a month after Marian was restored to him she became his wife.

Anne Gordon was present at the wedding. Her serene countenance told no tales; it bore no expression save the unruffled sweetness of the saint she was.



But that sweet friendship that had been so much to both her and Marian, in the dear old days when they had been so much to each other, was never quite restored. There was a certain constraint when they were together, an avoidance of the subject of the past, a hesitation in manner that each knew the other felt.

June Beckwith was still standing between them, as he did to the last day of their lives, even after Anne Gordon had pledged her troth to him whom she had tried and not found wanting.

And yet there is perfect peace, perfect contentment at last; for love has found the way.

IT will be 146 years ago the Fourth of this month of July since Uncle Sam commenced national housekeeping for himself and declared he was going to collect his own taxes in the future and see that they were expended in the way he himself wanted. Uncle Sam was young in those days, and though he had the best of causes—which he most pungently outlined—for seeking to go his own way, yet his action was one that rather naturally develops in all young and newly-settled outgrowths of a parent state. The new community or colony having passed beyond the days of coddling and governmental leading strings, begins to take longer strides, wants spending money of its own, sniffs the air of freedom, and ends by desiring complete freedom of action and national will. Without doubt, even if a high-headed, high-handed and distant government had not raised the temper of our forefathers from exasperation to the white heat of an indignation that required freedom as its only answer—yet even without these aggravating and hastening causes, separation from Great Britain would have come in one way or another, I believe, before many years had passed over growing Uncle Sam and his young and active head.

For Declarations of Independence spring easily to the lips and from the pens of young colonies in the same manner and from the same causes that a desire for freedom of action comes to many young people who believe themselves suffering injustices of parental control and who, in even milder-governed homes, begin to feel a wish to think and act for themselves. Yet youth must watch that its declarations of independence are as well founded as was the famous one of Uncle Sam's historic making. Among the letters I receive every month, I read many where boys and girls complain of home conditions and of the, to them, annoying regulations of parental control. There are some of these letters which show where restrictions of youthful liberty and pursuit of happiness have passed all proper measure, but in others that are sent me I find a much poorer case is made. I can read between the lines and see that the freedom desired is not that which will be put to the best of use by the young rebel.

For when we crave independence of action we should first ask ourselves to what use we mean to put our new liberty, or whether we are only to gain freedom which will allow us to throw aside responsibility and obedience in ways to injure our own lives.

Revolt and independence are not good in themselves; that is only good which can happily result from these reactions of freedom. When a boy or a girl turns away from home and the natural authority of household and blood ties, the task of proving the necessity of that action must rest on the maker. Even the best of excuses is not sufficient; it is the results that come after which must count and register the value of the decision of separation. When free of the real or fancied galling direction of parents, when away from just or unjust direction and control—then it is only through self-control, self-direction and self-discipline on the part of rebelling youth that justification can come. For we gain nothing in turning away from authority if we have nothing better ourselves to offer and are unable to show any self-growth as the result of our freedom-seeking.

There are instances—and I read many such unhappy, bitter and earnest letters—where a boy or girl is thoroughly justified in dissolving home ties. But when the declaration of independence is made, let the human document be justified by action; let liberty be shown to have been necessary for the winning; let youth step forth to a course that shows successful and righteous achievement. For even our own great nation must have failed if civil and moral principles had been abandoned by its founders; and so, too, no individual can find "life, liberty and pursuit of happiness" if the freedom earned is not used to set heart and soul free through the greatest independence of all—the learning to love and work and sacrifice together for the common good. This is the independence that will set the world liberated from poverty and disease, from the crimes of industrial selfishness and the dangers of national rivalries and ambitions.

"Youth must be served," but there is also a service that youth must render, a debt that must be paid when boys and girls of this generation step out in their newly-won independence to a world which is truly theirs because they are the last comers. The debt and service they owe is to make this world of theirs what the next generation must find it—a fairer and better living place for their children that are to be.

In our striving, we cannot go far wrong today if we work in the spirit in which the men of 146 years ago worked and planned. They sought no freedom for selfish ends of time and place. Instead they had a vision before them of what this liberated country might and could become, and they labored valiantly and sincerely to make their dream come true. As a result of the foundation these men laid, we Americans are able to enjoy the greatest amount of governmental independence, perhaps, of any of the world's nations. This condition has worked to make us personally independent; we are a nation of individualists, and often selfish ones as individualists must mostly be. Involved in our own schemes and self-seeking, our hope goes no further than our plans and pocketbooks, and we can care but little for our country because we are turned so closely to our own good. We forget to build for the coming generation so long as our own roof is tight. We read unheedingly the warning that "where there is no vision the people perish."

So we need, I say, to guard that our freedom be not freedom only to exercise thinly-disguised selfishness. Let us make our declaration of independence one that declares us free of every evil thing, and of the sins that so easily beset us. Let all of us, young and old, work together in the full liberty of loving service to make our country what it was founded to be this almost century and a half ago—the freest and happiest part of this twirling globe of God.

And now for the letters.

APPLE RIVER, ILLINOIS.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

Hello, there, Uncle! Gosh, I'm glad to meet you and the rest of the cousins. We've been taking COMFORT for about thirteen years and I like it. I'm sending Billy a picture of myself to let him look at while you print my letter—and don't let him laugh himself to death over it. If you can read these crow tracks, Uncle, you're a good one. Well, guess I'll describe myself before I forget: I'm five feet, five inches tall and weigh a hundred and twenty-two pounds. I'm a blondish brunette and have a light complexion with about eight little freckles on my nose. And say, Uncle, I wish you could taste some of my half-baked cake. Of course I can do better now, so I'm inviting you and Augustus Trick out to dinner. And I'm going to decorate my table with powder puffs. Won't that be fine? But, anyway, Augustus is right about some of the girls powdering too much. In my town some of the girls are that way; they powder so much that you can walk behind them and follow their trail as it falls off. But I haven't much time to powder. Instead of that I mud-ball with the boys at school. And you would think I had never seen water for a year. I had to wash today. I started at half-past six and was done at ten o'clock. I've a little more to say: there aren't many girls that are as bad as Augustus thinks they are. There are a few bad boys, too. They smoke cigars, buy hooch, get drunk and disobey their parents. But I don't mean all boys, because there's lots of good ones. That includes you, too, Uncle. You're a boy, too—only grown big. Well, give my best wishes to the cousins and Billy, and keep some for yourself, Uncle dear. And tell the boys and girls to write to me.

Bye-bye, MARY ELLA HEMILLER.

P. S. If this letter isn't long enough, Uncle, I'll write one as long as the Bible the next time.

It's always well to have one's freckles carefully counted, Mary Ella, and I'm glad you have your freckle census completed and results audited. I thought I counted nine in the charming photograph you sent me, but perhaps one of 'em was a horse-fly. I think eight to a nose is a good ration, although some substantial noses can stand twelve without bending. I knew a girl once who used to spend forty minutes of each day trying to count her freckles and the poor thing could never get the thing straight or come out the same at the end of each day's count. It was hard for her, because she was cross-eyed and would sometimes forget which side of her face she had counted last. She tried all sorts of schemes, blocking her countenance off into squares with red ink, and other clever plans, and finally she bought an adding machine, but this was money thrown away for it would only register up to three million. So she threw the blame thing in the creek, gave up counting, and bought a powder puff five inches in diameter. This was before the days of Augustus. I mean Cousin Gus, of course, and not the Roman emperor—for no girl who had read the proclamations coming from Muncy, Pa., would ever turn to a powder puff, not even if her freckle census ran into twelve figures.

Mary Ella, you must not get so much mud on you that it takes you from half-past six to ten of a summer morning to get washed up. You may be getting so much of Apple River loam on your nose that your eight freckles will be obscured and you cannot count them correctly.

If your cakes are only half baked, Mary E., your ideas are not. They are light and digestible. I think you are considerable of a cheerful philosopher. At any rate, you are willing to accept boys and girls as you find 'em—and you can find plenty of good in 'em. I can, too, Mary Ella.

YAKIMA, WASHINGTON.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for many years and seeing the Cousins' letters about the West, I thought I would write one. I wac born in Oregon before the railroad came. My parents crossed the plains with an ox team. I went to a little schoolhouse built of logs. Our seats were split logs with three pegs in for legs. We sat on the smooth side. Our heat came from an old chimney built of rocks and mud. We had three months of school each year; the rest of the year we boys played ball and other games. There were very few stoves, and we happened not to have any in our house. We had a rock chimney and a "dutch oven,"—in other words, a three-legged skillet with a lid which my mother covered over with hot coals from the fire to cook our bread. I was very much afraid of the Indians and I finally learned to talk their language. Now they are very civilized and harmless. I am acquainted with the Indians that made the visit to see President Harding a few months ago.

I came to the Yakima Valley in Washington from the Willamette Valley in Oregon forty years ago. Everything had to be hauled from the Dalles, Oregon, with freight wagons for a hundred miles. This country then was wild sagebrush, rocks, rattlesnakes, and the Indians wore blankets and long hair. Today they go with their hair shingled and as well dressed as the whites. At present the Yakima Valley has become one of the best fruit districts in the U. S. As I have never been out of Oregon and Washington, I would like to see a level country, so I am thinking of seeing the U. S. first and taking a trip East.

Well, this is the first letter I have ever written to COMFORT, and if it is fit to print, do so, but do not print my name and address.

Your nephew, DAVE OF WASHINGTON.

It is good once in a while to have a voice tell of past years, Dave, and remind us, as you do, of what has been the astounding growth of our great Western empire during the past half century. With his axe and other tools, his pioneer energy and his habits of toil learned in subduing lands left behind him, the white man moved Westward with the vanishing sun as a leader. And, like enchantment, towns and church spires rose and homes grew where the Indian for so long had freely hunted and roamed.

Pushed backward, aside and underground, the Indian was forced to give way to the men of this new race, bringing the magic of steady industry and adding the power of steam and steel to their native strength. With the coming of the railroad, the "iron horse," the spread of the white man's magic was immensely widened and hastened. The days of the pony-riding, buffalo-hunting, eagle-feathered and blanket-wearing Indian were no more. So race has succeeded race on the fretted surface of old earth and sometimes the records of such ancient changing and passings are hard to read. As we do not know for certain the color and habits of those men who lived, fought and died in North America thousands of years ago, so we cannot tell of what race and color may be the men who far centuries in the future may build strange hearthfires above some of our buried cities. The remembering of such things as these helps us to better adjust the outlook and incidents of our own transitory lives to the thousands and ten thousands of years in which Time works when dealing with this and other planets. Probably there was a Date Growers' Association in Assyria thirty or forty centuries ago, and it is hard to reckon what may be the fate or standing of Yakima apples in the year 4000, for instance. But let us hope prices will be good for the men who sell them then!

When you make your trip East, Dave, Drop in to see me and bring along a big Skookum apple in your pocket to feed to Billy as you and I talk a little Indian together. I learned mine from a cigar store warrior twenty years ago. I will say, "Ooogly, oogly wah! Un skun skise," when I see you, Dave. This is Sioux for—but why tell you? You know just as well as I do. I was interested to hear of those civilized Indians that have their hair shingled, David. These must be part of the tribe of "wooden Indians" about whom I have often read.

AUBURNDALE, R. R. 1, BOX 39, FLA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I am a little girl ten years old. I have read COMFORT about a year or longer and I like it fine. I live in the country and like it out here. I go to school in the country and am in the fourth grade. I like my teacher fine. Mother said that my letter would be throwed in the waste-basket.

Your loving niece, SUSIE KNOWLES.

Mothers are rather remarkable creatures, Susie, as you have probably noticed, and they have a mysterious way of being always right. It is a very nice thing that they are that way, for when they have boys and girls to manage there are so many things they have to be right about. However, here is one instance where a mother was wrong, Susie. Your letter was not "throwed" in the waste-basket, or even thrown where Billy's nose might find it. But as it is your mother, and I'm sure she is the best sort of a one, I will not count this mistake against her. Probably it is the first she has made in the ten years you have known her. And you must not let this first mistake make you doubt her, Susie, for I think it is very much of a certainty that she will not be wrong again during the next ten years of your acquaintance.

MUNCY, R. R. 6, PA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

Hello, everybody! Aw, now you girls needn't frown so just because I am back once more. Gee, can't you give a fellow a smile once in a while?

Well, a year has rolled around since I wrote my first letter to the League of Cousins and by way of properly celebrating the event I'm here again. Yet by the frowns I see I guess some of you wish I'd stayed another year. But I've got a mind all my own, and so here I am.

First of all, let me thank Billy for his excellent thinking qualities. He sure handed me a compliment in answer to my last letter. But I was also handed something else. Oh, so you'd like to know what? Well, to be exacting and precise, I was handed two powder puffs and something over 1700 letters and a few score postcards. But I value Billy's gift far more than the rest of the bunch, for it goes to show that even goats are possessed of intelligence.

Now for a brief word on the ever new subject—Girls and their powder puffs. As Ruth acted as spokesgirl for the girl population, I will say something first about her letter. I will try to be fair in my criticism. I want to ask, first of all, Who said I was prejudiced against girls? Of course a few hundred of them think I am a womanhater, but who dares to say it is a fact? Does it necessarily prove that just because I said I could have just as good a time with boys as with girls, that I hate the girls? Rather, doesn't it show a little of the proper boy spirit? I'd call a boy a "sissy" if he were otherwise. Could it not be possible for me to also enjoy the company of girls? Think it over.

Now for the welfare question: It is true that companions must be selected with care, for one miss leads to many. Bad companionship is the cause of the downfall of thousands of boys and girls. And I agree with you, Ruth, in saying home conditions contribute a lot toward the future of all boys and girls. Too strict home methods are worse than those that aren't so strict. Young folks that are literally "caged" in their homes, with few privileges, are bound to be more or less wild when they escape the surveillance of parents.

One girl confessed to me that her mother taught her to smoke cigarettes. Being one of high society, it was style to smoke. Now if style demands that girls should smoke, I think style should be abolished.

The same applies to the use of cosmetics. It is the fashion to use them. In our big cities we cannot go to any gathering and find many who do not use the stuff. And what is more find it literally daubed on. And so thick it can be scraped off. Fashion and style are a curse to mankind. If we must cover up the true complexion God gave us, why not wear a mask? For the way some women persist in using cosmetics it is a mask. For we cannot see their real complexion. I have no wish to be unreasonable, and I do not mind the use of a little powder; but as for rouge, I despise it. I cannot help but think that if girls would get a little more sleep and fresh air, their complexions would not require the aid of so much make-up to make them attractive. And what is more, its use actually ruins the complexion. Those who use it for a long time look faded without its use. Isn't that sufficient proof?

A certain girl with whom I corresponded for a short time became peeved at my plain talk concerning the latest dances and mode of dress. She said that I was "no gentleman" to say such things. Then she went on to say that she never associated with any but "perfect gentlemen," and further on she informed me that every man or boy she was ever with had tried to act "fresh." Now here's the point: I was no gentleman for talking plain, but her associates were perfect gentlemen even if

This test will delight you

Again we offer, and urge you to accept, this new teeth-cleaning method.

Millions now employ it. Leading dentists, nearly all the world over, are urging its adoption. The results are visible in whiter teeth wherever you look today.

Bring them to your people.

The war on film

Dental science has declared a war on film. That is the cause of most tooth troubles. And brushing methods of the past did not effectively combat it.

Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. Then night and day it may do serious damage.

Film absorbs stains, making the teeth look dingy. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Very few people have escaped the troubles caused by film.

Two film combatants

Now two combatants have been found. Many careful tests have proved their efficiency.

A new-day tooth paste has been created, and these two film combatants are embodied in it. The paste is called Pepsodent.

Now every time you brush your teeth you can fight those film-coats in these effective ways.

Also starch and acids

Another tooth enemy is starch. It also clings to teeth, and in fermenting it forms acids.

To fight it Nature puts a starch digestant in saliva. She also puts alkalis there to neutralize the acids.

Pepsodent multiplies the salivary flow. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. It multiplies the alkalis. Thus these teeth protecting forces, twice a day, are much increased.

They must be done

These things must be done. Teeth with film or starch or acids are not white or clean or safe. You know yourself, no doubt, that old tooth-brushing methods are inadequate.

See what the new way does.

Make this pleasant ten-day test and watch your teeth improve.

A few days will tell

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

Do this now. The effects will delight you and lead to constant delights. To all in your home they may bring new beauty, new protection for the teeth.

Beauty from the Inside Out

LOVELY flowers have their roots way out of sight and on what those roots get in the way of nourishment and drink depends all the beauty and even the life of the flowers.

Lovely ladies are much like flowers. They may have an outward seeming that is beautiful to behold but it will not remain so unless the roots of that beauty are given the care and attention they need.

Beauty has its birth inside the body and finds its way to the surface only if we are careful to make the way easy for it. You can't grow a flower from the blossom down to the root, but only by starting out of sight way down in the soil.

THE ATTRACTIVE GIRL LOOKS AFTER HER HEALTH.

Take this lesson to heart and realize that beauty must come from within. It has two sources—physical and spiritual. Clear skins, clear eyes, freedom from pimples, blackheads, sallow skin, a body that is not too thin and not too fat—all these are physical and depend upon the attention you are paying to that little inside of yours. Beautiful curves to the mouth, a lovely expression in the eyes, a soft voice, gracious movements of the body, while in part physical must also depend upon the spiritual—that is, upon what you feel and think and are. Your spiritual self finds expression through eyes, mouth, voice, movement. Be sure the disclosure is something of which you may be proud.

Now about the physical. Of course it goes without saying that proper food has much to do with beauty. A body that is not properly nourished is anæmic, thin, sallow or perhaps, on the other hand, fat, sluggish, pimply. I have told you so much about foods that I do not need to enumerate again the good and the bad. But I must emphasize the fact that the digestive and eliminative organs must not be allowed to become sluggish else the best food in the world may do you little good and your system may become clogged with waste products. You must give those organs enough fluid, of course, to help the elimination, but you must also give the body enough exercise so that each organ is stimulated to action. Outdoor exercise and air should form a part of every day—very active exercise, if possible, but at any rate a walk of some length. This should be supplemented by indoor exercise designed to stimulate all the eliminative organs.

Deep-breathing exercises for not less than five minutes should begin the day, taken by an open window and with no constricting clothing.

Follow these with abdominal exercises, after drinking a glass of water. The familiar exercise to be taken lying flat on the bed, arms at side, and consisting of raising one leg at right angles with the body without bending the knee, then lowering it as slowly as you possibly can also without bending the knee, is perhaps the best. Practice this ten or fifteen times with one leg, then with the other, then with both, bringing the legs as nearly to right angles with the body as your unaccustomed muscles permit. Persist in this practice until you can make the perfect right angle, even though it may take you many weeks, and then persist in it for good health's sake.

At night before retiring, see that you have taken a glass of water at least an hour before, then practice the bending exercise, standing with heels together, toes slightly out, hands raised above head. Without bending the elbows or knees, throw arms out and down in an attempt to touch the floor with the finger-tips. Practice ten or fifteen times.

Of course take a complete body bath daily. The skin sheds tiny scales throughout the day, and these clog the pores. Sponge the surface of the body at night, if you do not take a tub bath, and rub it dry, the friction speeding up the circulation and thus performing good deeds for the skin. In the morning again, either take a tub bath or a complete sponge. I prefer a tub bath at night, warm and luxurious, just before going to bed, and a sponge somewhat cool in the morning to make one feel brisk and energetic.

Pimples are an indication of something wrong with the digestive and eliminative functions. Be sure your bodily habits are right, then correct your food, cutting out rich or over-sweet foods, and fats as well.

Blackheads are merely an impolite way of saying that your face isn't clean! Truly! All you need is soap and water regularly, over the whole body. Better use a camel's-hair complexion brush to cleanse your face every night. Don't wield it too vigorously, and do not rub soap on it or the face. Merely dip the brush in soapy water before applying it. Then rinse the face thoroughly after. And don't use a more bristly brush than camel's hair or you will injure your skin.

You can't be beautiful unless you are so from the inside out, remember, so start now at the roots!

Answers to Questions

ANXIOUS.—I am sorry it is against the rules of this department to answer questions by mail. You see, so many people can be reached by an answer in COMFORT, and only one by a letter; and we want to help the greater number. Then, of course, the service of this department is intended for the regular readers of COMFORT. Why don't you send in half a dollar for a year's subscription and thus become a member of the Pretty Girl's Club? Or one dollar will pay for the magazine for three years! In the meantime I am going to answer your questions and hope you may see this issue of our friendy magazine. Cold cream certainly does not injure the skin; it is good for it. But the face must be perfectly clean before it is applied. At night give the facial skin a thorough but gentle scrubbing with a camel's-hair complexion brush or a soft washcloth dipped in soapy water which is quite warm. Do not rub soap on the skin, of course. Rinse the face many times, and dry. Then dipping the tips of the fingers in the cold cream apply to the face and rub in gently until it is all absorbed. Wipe over the surface of the skin gently with a pad of cotton batting afterward. In the morning bathe the face with tepid water. You say your skin is rough; you may have been using soap directly on the face; or perhaps you haven't been quite careful to keep it perfectly clean. You say your skin looks like "buttermilk dried." I am inclined to think you have been overgenerous with the amount of cold cream you have applied, then have not rubbed it all in nor wiped off the surface after, and have not washed the face thoroughly in the morning. But let me say something else; at your age you really do not need cold cream! Better let the skin entirely alone, only being careful to bathe the entire body daily, to cleanse the skin before going to bed, to drink lots of water that impurities may be carried from the body, to eat three times a day but not between meals, to choose your foods carefully, and to exercise. That means outdoor exercise, of course, though you may supplement it with indoor exercise, as well. Walk, and go berrying, and swim if there is opportunity, play tennis,—do whatever is possible where you live. Outdoor air is always possible, however, and the exercise of walking or climbing hills is open to everybody. You say you want to increase your weight. Exercise—which by making organs function properly adds weight to thin people and takes weight from fat people—and proper food, and careful daily body bathing will make you gain. The foods which will add flesh are potatoes, rice, butter, white bread (not hot), butter, milk, cream, cereals. Eat lots of green vegetables and fresh fruits. Don't eat fried foods, nor foods cooked in much grease. A good breakfast is a huge bowl of cooked cereal with cream or milk, and very little sugar. A couple of slices of toasted bread with butter, a glass of milk, a dish of stewed prunes or apple sauce, or a baked apple or a dish of berries, a slice of melon, sliced peaches—something in the way of fruit. A good dinner consists of fish or lamb or mutton chops or roast beef or beefsteak (broiled), or roast or fricasseed chicken; a baked potato, white bread and butter, some stewed carrots or string beans or asparagus or peas or spinach or other greens, etc. And for dessert again, some of the fruits, or a corn-starch blanc mange with cream, baked custard, ice cream, rice pudding, etc. Pork (except bacon), veal and all fried foods are hard to digest; pies and cakes and rich preserves are also; though a piece of cake occasionally will not hurt you. Food between meals is bad for you because it overworks your stomach, though a growing girl could have a glass of milk between breakfast and dinner and one between dinner and supper. A good supper would be a glass of milk or a bowl of milk toast, a soft-boiled egg, and some dessert. Creamed codfish makes a good supper dish; tomato toast (tomatoes heated with salt and a little butter, and poured over slices of buttered toast), soup, scrambled eggs, cold meat, creamed potatoes—any or all of these are good supper dishes. About rouge and powder, if I were you I should not use these until some years later. They are not necessary, they are bad for the skin of a young girl and, perhaps worst of all, they are unfashionable for the young girl. And who wants to be out of the fashion? The best families and the most fashionable young girls do not include rouge or powder among the permissible things. If you want color in your cheeks, it is obtainable at your age by proper outdoor exercise and plenty of good food. It will do no harm after bathing to apply a little talcum powder with a soft pad of cotton—just dusting the face with it; but beyond that I should let my skin alone. You will be a much more beautiful young woman if you do.

NEW YORK, R. F. D.—Of course the best way to remove moles is by electrolysis, administered by a skilled operator. Moles tampered with by the amateur sometimes develop into more serious conditions; while at the best there is often a slight scar left which is less desirable than the mole itself. With these cautions, which please bear in mind, I may say that a method of removing moles which is sometimes recommended consists in moistening salicylic acid with alcohol or glycerine and applying to the mole, tying a cloth over the application to keep it on the mole for half an hour. The acid eats away the morbid tissue and when the spot heals up it is less in size. Three applications are said to remove the mole, usually. My own advice is not to apply anything. If you can have your mole removed by electrolysis, well and good, but otherwise I should let well enough alone.

A. H. D.—To remove hair from the armpits, add four ounces of water to one ounce of sulphate of barium. Wet corn-starch with this solution and make with it a spreadable paste. Apply to the hairy spots. Leave on only until dry or the skin will be burned and irritated. Scrape off the paste with the blunt edge of a silver knife or of a bone paper cutter, and the hair will come with it. Bathe and rub in a little cold cream.

GOLDIE,.—Coffee three times a day! My dear, no wonder your complexion is out of order. Cut yourself down at once to one cup of coffee a day, be sure that you drink it as soon as it comes to a boil, or, rather, that it is poured off the grounds as soon as it comes to a boil. Drink your coffee in the morning or at noon, but never at night. Coffee is as disastrous taken in excessive quantities as some of the drugs which we call injurious. Accustomed to so much coffee, you will feel all "let down," when you cut your allowance, but after a week this feeling should wear away. Do not drink with your meals, that is while there is food in your mouth, as this is bad for your digestion. The red blotches of which you speak are of course from indigestion, or rather the derangement of your digestive apparatus. Drink a glass of water half an hour before each meal, and other glasses of water between meals, so that you get about eight glasses of water daily. In regard to the freckle lotion, if you will exactly follow directions in applying, it will not scar. If you refer to the one consisting of two ounces of lactic acid to one of glycerine and one-half ounce of rose-water, you can apply this several times a day by pouring a little into a saucer and moistening a soft linen cloth in this to apply to the face. In using anything on the skin, if the latter becomes irritated, stop the use of the lotion at once, and rub in a little cold cream or zinc ointment. But you should have no such experience with this. As to the proprietary remedy you refer to, it is against the rules of this department to express any opinion about proprietary remedies. I hope what I have said in answer to your questions may be a real help.

A SKIN WITHOUT BLEMISH MEANS A PROPER DIET.

COUNTRY SCHOOLTEACHER.—Your question is out of my province, but I am answering it just the same. Here are the names of a few companies which produce moving pictures. Let me advise you, however, that you have no chance of getting into the movies unless you are where the companies are producing, and then there is only a bare chance that you could get employed for an "extra," which means to form part of a scene. Such employment is intermittent and nothing to seek to enter. Better stick to your story-writing. Universal Film Mfg. Co., 1600 Broadway, New York City. Goldwyn Film Corporation, 16 East 42nd St., New York City. Fox Film Corporation, 130 West 46th St., New York City. Vitagraph Co., 1600 Broadway, New York City. These addresses are of the offices of the concerns; their studios are in New York, California, etc., etc.

BROWN EYES.—No, I do not know of anything that will permanently remove superfluous hair from the legs. Using ammonia one day and peroxide of hydrogen the next, to dampen the hairy spots, may do the deed in time, and will in any case make the hair less noticeable. A depilatory would only remove it temporarily, and back it would come livelier than ever.

SMILES.—If I were you I would not tamper with that birthmark. You are likely to leave a scar in its place. You might do this, however: Wet the spot, powder it white, then apply a layer of flexible collodion, which you can buy of your druggist, using flesh-colored powder over that after it has dried. This may camouflage the spot. If it is a very large spot, this may not work, but try it. The only method of removal, other than by electrolysis, is to cover the surrounding skin with vaseline or lard, then burn off the scar with a strong acid, but as I do not approve of this in the hands of an amateur I do not feel that I should tell you the name of the acid. My dear, you would only have a worse scar for your pains, I am sure. Try the collodion, which may prove a feasible method of concealing the spot. Of course you would constantly have to renew the application.

W. W.—The cause of blackheads and pimples on back and shoulders is inattention to the care of the skin. Begin taking a complete body bath daily. Better take a warm bath, with soap in the water, at night; rinsing the body thoroughly afterward, and rubbing it vigorously with a bath towel; and in the morning give the skin a cold sponge and another brisk frictioning. Eat sensible foods; see answer to "Anxious." Dark rings under the eyes mean that your health is not in good condition; sometimes it means injurious habits. Take stock of yourself and see what is wrong. Exercise more than you do. A body needs lots of good hard exercise every day. And enough sleep with the windows wide open. Food and exercise and proper body bathing daily will build you up into perfect health and strength if you will get right to work at it with a will. Pimples are only one way the body has of trying to throw off its impurities. See that the eliminative organs function properly. Plenty of water, fruit and exercise will help you in this.

GRAY EYES.—For the rough red hands, be careful not to use too much soap on them, too often, to use as mild a soap as possible and to dry the hands carefully. One thing apt to make hands rough and red is to put them in hot water, then take them out with a hasty drying, and do something else in the kitchen or about the house, put them back again, and so on. Changes of temperature affect the hands badly. A little ground oatmeal is good to rub on the hands after drying—or almond meal. And bran water is excellent in which to wash the hands—rinse the hands—after an ordinary cleansing wash. You can make the bran water by adding bran to boiling water and letting it boil a short time, then cool and strain, using as needed. Corn-meal isn't bad to use to rub the hands in after drying. A few drops of tincture of benzoin added to the water in which you rinse your hands will soften the water and be beneficial. Now about the pimples. There is probably something the matter with either your diet or the condition of your bowels. Take a body bath daily. If you haven't a bathtub, you can fold a towel to stand on and give yourself a quick sponge with warm water, and a rinsing sponge with cool water, without having more than a wash-bowl and wash-cloth to help you. But this is essential to your bodily health as well as your personal appearance. Be careful that you do not get chilled in taking this sponge; uncover only part of your body at a time, and when washed and dried, cover up before washing another portion of the body. With your skin, however, you ought to avoid greasy foods and too much sugar—which means candy, cake and sweet desserts. If you are quite girlish in appearance and have fairly long hair, it is all right to keep it braided. A cut lemon rubbed on your freckles may bleach them. As a matter of fact, freckles are beneath the skin and only something which peels the skin off really disposes of them. If they are summer freckles, I would let them alone until fall, and then dispose of them ready for next summer. Taking them off now renders the skin tender, and new freckles are apt to come much more numerously than before. In the winter, when once taken off, there are several months for the skin to toughen again.

BROWN EYES B. Y. P. V.—If your lips are not red, it indicates that you are not in as good a physical condition as you should be. You must at once begin to exercise daily and vigorously, outdoors whenever possible and indoors when you can't get outdoor exercise. You can always take a walk every day, can you not, and a good long one? Then practice arm exercises and deep breathing. A good way to practice deep breathing is to stand in front of your open window in the morning (or at any time, for the matter of that), and standing perfectly erect with the chest raised and the arms at sides, breathe in slowly through the nose (keeping the mouth closed) until your lungs have all the air they can hold. Wait a moment, then let the breath out again, not in one gasp but very, very slowly indeed. Do this over and over again. Deep breathing can be practiced when you are outdoors, and anything which increases your lung capacity will improve your health and start you on the way to the red lips you desire. Then eat plenty of nourishing food, be careful about your daily bath (see answer to "Gray Eyes"), drink lots of water, and take part in every healthy outdoor game you can. I imagine from your description that the little "spots" of which you complain are whiteheads. These form under the skin and indicate that your processes of elimination are not functioning as they should, and probably that your circulation is not good (the pale lips testify to this, also). So get at diet, exercise, deep breathing, right away. It would be a good idea, in the meantime, for you to massage your face nightly. Dip your fingers into your cold cream jar and liberally smear the face, which should first have been washed in hot soapy water and rinsed very thoroughly indeed. Then using the flat of the fingers, massage the face all over very thoroughly. In massaging the cheeks, rub always up, never down, starting at the chin and massaging up toward the temples. In massaging the forehead rub first from temple to temple many times, then up and down first in one spot of forehead, then in another until you have gone over all. In massaging nose, this must be with a very gentle pinching motion, with thumb and forefinger, beginning at bridge of nose and following on down the nose to the tip. This will probably help to loosen up these little spots of secretions which have formed under the skin.

I repeat the caution I gave last month—protect your skin from the injurious effect of summer sun and wind by applying a good cold cream and powder to face and neck before going outdoors, also lotion on hands after washing.

LOVE LETTERS FOR AUNTIE

By Yetta Kay Stoddard

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

HAVE you ever taken care of a carper? A captious, caviling, cantankerous old man? An irritable, irritating, precious old dear? That was Bemie Anthony's job in the house of her ill-tempered and cross-grained, insolent and abusive, grandfather, "Brick" Anthony. And she had given up prospects of a happy home with Ben Appelman, for this: for dressing and undressing old Brick; for feeding him, keeping him clean and well and not wholly disgusted with the childish helplessness of his declining years; for making herself the target of his insults—particularly for this target-business, it seemed.

And here's another question: Have you at the same time tried to supervise the rearing of a Darling Boy? A ten-year-old, handsome, fire-eating late edition of the contentious other charge on your hands? Two whirlwinds? Twins with the space of seventy years between? Well, that's Bemie—her other job.

The Anthonys were redheads, and they married redheads. From being a perpetual nickname, "Brick" had been raised to the dignity of baptism at the time Grandpa Brick was eight days old. His son, Brick, was Bemie's father; his grandson, Brick III, this "Little Brick's" father. Don't worry about the similarity of names, for at the time Bemie gave up hopes of Ben Appelman and came across town to look after her grandfather and nephew, there was no other Anthonys. Old Brick, Little Brick, Bemie, Ben. That's the list. No. I beg pardon. There was also another Bemie. She was Old Brick's little love, his bride, his eternal sweetheart, dead these fifty-odd years and yet there in the house with the three of them, a fresh and lovely memory—though neither Little Brick nor his patient auntie had ever seen her.

* * * * * * * *

"Well, I'm blest to my sole-leathers, Bemie, if you aren't the last word in numskullity! Foolwoman, empty-pate, are your brains scrambled, too? Didn't I say poached, poached, POACHED?"

"Grandpa, dear! I was sure you said scrambled. But it doesn't matter at all. I'll just bring you two others. It won't take two minutes."

"Two! You drooling dunce! If you bring me eggs underdone I'll——"

"You'll send me back—won't you? And I'll go! I'll have your eggs right or I'll die in the doing."

"And take all day to it, you're that mortally slow. My heavens! Here I am, starving to death and you stand talking and promising and wasting gas, time, temper. Get along! Get along, before I say something you'll be sorry for, you daughter of ancient imbecility! You——"

"You stop! Greatgrander! You gotta stop talking to my auntie like she was bad! I'll, I'll—I'll do something awful if you don't stop. Are you going to stop? Are you?"

Little Brick had his fists doubled under his great-grandfather's right eye. His mop of red hair flapped with the vehemence of his emotion. Bemie, holding the breakfast tray aloft, put her disengaged arm around Little Brick's neck and brought him to the door. Outside, in the kitchen, she was there-thereing him soothingly to the accompaniment of her own perturbed, her frantic haste to get a pair of eggs poached.

"There-there, Brick, darling! Greatgrander doesn't mean a word nor a sound of the bad things he says to me. It's just his oldness, Brick. When you and I are old——"

"You're old, now, Auntie."

The hurt! Oh, nothing that Old Brick had ever flung at her tortured her like this gentle stab of Little Brick's. Was she aging? Was the fault-finding of the irascible one, the responsibility of mothering her two Bricks, getting the best of her? Why, it must not! She was too necessary to them. Grandpa might live twenty years yet and Little Brick would hardly be ready in less time to face the world and a possible wife.

"But not so old as your Greatgrander, remember, dear one. And Greatgrander was once a little red-haired boy like you, doubling his fists and saying big bad words, maybe, when he should not. You should not. Do you understand, Brick? You must learn loving, loving. It's your only safe way, Darling Boy."

"I do love you. I love you and it makes me mad when he gets to hollering and calling names. I could holler louder and I could call him ten thousand times as worse names as he knows. I could hit him in the eye!"

"Brick! You must not. You——"

A great thumping interrupted Bemie's terrified remonstrances.

"Are you waiting for the hens to lay those eggs? My limping lady-laggard, if you don't bring me some breakfast I'll——"

"Coming, coming, Grandpa, dear! In just one little teenty-weenty fraction of a second you shall have the nicest, tastiest, toastiest little breakfast you've had in a month of Sundays. Here I come! Sit up!"

As she turned, tray held high again, she whispered stealthily:

"You run on to school, Darling Boy. And don't think of anything but happy, happy, happy thoughts."

Little Brick reached for his good-by kiss, beamed on Bemie, and went. But his thoughts were not happy. He was listening, in fancy, to a torrent of picturesque invective cascading above the meek head of his auntie; he saw her sprayed with stinging sarcasm, submerged beneath a steady stream of reproaches.

* * * * * * *

Rare tears veiled from Bemie the image she tried to scan in the kitchen mirror. A tired face struggled through the mist and returned her inquiring gaze.

"Old? Wrinkled?"

The reflected face began to nod an inexorable Yes, indeed! but Bemie held up her hand.

"No!" she said, imperiously. "You are not old and you are not at all wrinkled. You are a tired face, an anxious face, a not-very-well-cared-for one. But you're still young! You've got to keep young!"

While Grandpa Brick snored in his after-breakfast dreams of a lovely Bemie of his long ago, his granddaughter Bemie spent a daring hour at prettying herself. She brushed her brown curls, and piled them new-fashionedly. And here her brown curls must be accounted for, for they account for her sweet patience with her two red-headed Bricks. Bemie's mother. That's the key. She was calm, unruffled, steady as a stone wall, charming, brown-haired.

"Little Brick's mother's hair was really auburn," she remembered, as she hot-toweled her cheeks. "If I can keep him quiet through his formative years, he may not grow up as fiery as Dad, as Grandpa. Oh, I hope I can!"

She put on pink. Little Brick's eyes would glint when he saw her. They always glinted at sight of pink. She put just the faintest dab of rouge on one cheek, scrutinizing the effect impersonally. A dab to the other.

"There, Bemie. You are young. I defy Little Brick to say old to me again! For Ben's sake—I've just got to keep youngish. At least youngish."

Ben Appelmen lingered then in memory? Oh, yes. There was something queer between Bemie and Ben. They had always loved and always taken each other for granted with no words of love, written or spoken, passing between them. Sometimes now Bemie longed traitorously for her own home with just both of them, Ben and she together, alone in it. An instantaneous, passing thought, this; followed always by the opening of the doors of her heart to Little Brick with his wild, sweet ways; and to Grandpa Brick, too, with his wild, awful, terrible, shocking, annoying ways.

* * * * * * * *

Little Brick came in at noon, shouting.

"No more school this week! Hurray! Teacher's sick and they can't get a sub! Hurray!"

"Hush, Darling Boy," Bemie whispered. "Your Greatgrander's remembering."

"I'm going out and play cartwheel."

"No, dear. Not in the rain. You have some lunch here on the kitchen table. Maybe it will clear soon."

"I can cartwheel in the store-room."

"It's so crowded. You'll hurt yourself."

"That's what you have to learn. To cartwheel in places where you'll get hurt if you don't look out. You come on and try, Auntie. It's fun!"

"Me? Gracious, Darling Boy! I'm too old to stand on my head."

"Old? You are not old? You look just exactly like a little-girl lady, Auntie. I wish you'd wear a pink dress all the time."

Bemis helped him clear a space in the store-room. Old boxes, bulging bags, dusty trunks of antique types, bursting with tender memories of a past that was dead when his auntie was ten, yielded him place.

"You going to try, Auntie? See! You just spread your hands and give a twist to your legs and—it's just as easy."

But Bemie had fled at the call of a white-headed, violent old Brick, to perform another and less easy kind of cartwheel. Cartwheels of the soul.

* * * * * * * *

The rain increased. Little Brick had tired. He was kneeling before a small trunk, reading old, almost sixty-year-old love letters. The paper was yellow-brown, the ink watery, the characters boldly erratic; and Little Brick was a very small boy. Yet, as he read, a golden world opened, a world of impassioned love. He himself was the B. A. who signed himself with so grand a flourish here; the dearest Bemie written on the faded pages none other than his pinky Auntie.

His own cheeks flaming with the ardor of his sentiments, he extracted the bravest of the love-letters from the package, restored the general appearance of ribbon and adjacent bundles in the tray; closed the trunk and stole to his own room. There, on fresh and crispy modern note-paper, with blue-black writing fluid, with unaccustomed painstaking, he labored to reproduce for Auntie that ancient, burning,

"My Dearest Bemie:—
"I take my Pen in Hand To-Night....."

And Bemie's cheeks were redder than any rouge she had ever applied to them when she got away from her disagreeable and annoying old Grandfather that afternoon. She went to her own room and locked the door. Not even Little Brick must see her break; if break she must; if indeed her soul had not sufficient of those still, long-suffering joyous-martyr qualities her mother had bequeathed her.

"Ben!" she was sobbing. And she had no reason for calling on Ben Appelman. She had been in her grandfather's house for three months without hearing from a great, timid, gentle and foolish, silent, shining-eyed giant whom she loved. Perhaps he was glad to be rid of her! Perhaps he had never really cared. Why, think as she could and did, there was no recollection behind her thoughts of any actual proposal of marriage by Ben nor of any worded acceptance by her. They had not been engaged at all. Her world was a world of disappointment and heartbreaking; she was held a victim of frightful tempers and of more frightful intolerance; bitterness and despair were hers, hers invariably to remain through the years.

She heard Little Brick scampering to her door. She had gotten up from the bed where she had thrown herself, hurrying to the looking-glass, in order to repair the damages of her tempestuous half-hour. She stared, unbelieving.

"I'm old. I'm old. I'm old."

Her lips were still moving mechanically when Little Brick looked up at her, his eyes glinting more merrily than ever she had before noticed.

"Yes, Darling Boy. What is it?" she compelled herself to say in a tone calculated to match his happy mood.

"Here's a letter from—— Here's a letter for you, Auntie."

* * * * * * *

Behind the closed door she opened it. As she read, a lovely pink spread itself from cheek to temple, up into the roots of her curly brown hair; a soft young smile played at the corners of her pretty mouth; her breath came faster and faster; and when she had finished she sighed a deliciously contented:

"Ah!"

It was queer that she could be so easily fooled. The ink was scarcely dry. The note-paper, of a standard and popular manufacture, she herself had bought for Little Brick. And there was nothing but an old canceled stamp on the envelope to help out Little Brick's make-believe. On the other hand, Bemie was hungry for word from reticent Ben; and besides, she had never seen his handwriting.

Following the sigh, a gurgling laugh; following the gurgle another glance into the glass; following that a hasty brush across disarranged curls, a pat or two to a crumpled pink dress, and Bemie was flying back to Grandpa. His peevish attack began with her hand on the door-knob.

"Where have you been, you gamboling, galloping gad-about? Odds eyelashes! Woman, you'll neglect me no longer. I'll——"

"Grandpa, dear!" It was one of Bemie's wise little ways, to stop the old rascal before he had committed himself to threats of murder. "Grandpa, dear, I've just had a letter from Ben. He wants me to marry him, immediately, now. But of course I want to talk it all over with you before giving him an answer."

Old Brick had snatched the paper from her fingers. Presently, in spite of his visible attempt to control his emotions, the sneer upon his lips gave way to a perceptible quiver.

"My Dearest Bemie:—
"I take my Pen in Hand To-Night to let YOU know....."

There was something decidedly familiar about the stereotyped phrases. Old Brick wiped his glasses, adjusted them, blew his nose before putting away his handkerchief, and took up his reading where he had left off.

"for I feel YOU know the Sincerity of that which I am about to say.....the Depth of my Attachment for YOU, which is undying, faithful to the End, and beyond. Words of Love have not passed between us but now they can no longer be held back. I pour them about YOUR Feet, my Sweet. Let us marry, soon, soon. Let our Hands and our Hearts wed as from of Old have our Souls. My Arms await YOU. Will YOU come? I dare not look upon YOU until I have YOUR Answer. I pray YOU keep me not in Waiting.
"Forever thine, B. A."

Old Brick lay back in his chair, blissful memories astir within his head, his heart, his very soul. He had come alive suddenly. He and the eternal sweetheart that was the first Bemie Anthony were reunited. He smiled, he wept a little, and he became slowly aware of the smiling, weeping Bemie who knelt beside him. Not for her those reverential Y-O-U'S of his heart's creating; but she must never know.

"Ben—have you been hearing from Ben regularly?" he queried, a new note of gentleness lingering from word to word.

"No. It's the first letter I've ever had from him, Grandpa. But it's sweet, isn't it? Worth waiting for?"

"Sweet. Tender. Dear girl, do you love this Ben?"

"Yes."

"Will you let me think awhile alone?"

"Of course, Grandpa. There's no hurry."

* * * * * * * *

A strange, new, joyous Auntie greeted Little Brick out in the side-yard.

"Did you read it?" he asked, cartwheeling in her general direction.

"Of course I did," she laughed.

"Are you going to do it?"

"Do what?" she asked, horrified that he should have pried.

"Oh, nothing," chuckled Little Brick.

* * * * * * * *

At the telephone a querulous old voice and a surprised youngish one held strange converse.

"Do you love my granddaughter?"

"I do, sir."

"Do you want to marry her?"

"I do indeed, sir."

"Well, why in the name of all that's sanctified, haven't you asked her to marry you, then?"

"I could never get up the sand to do it, sir."

"Listen, here young man. You come to my house immediately. And you pretend that you have just written her a good old-fashioned, love-making proposal. My scalawaggish great-grandson has just copied out one of my own, my own only proposal to the sweetest woman in the world, excepting your Bemie, and your Bemie thinks it's from you. Understand?"

"I understand. Thank Little Brick for me. I'll be there as fast as gasolene will take me."

Love That Was Denied

Text—If women take the world for their oyster and think, when they open it, they are going to find pearl necklaces ready-made—we must not blame them. Rather, let hoary-headed sinners envy them their imaginings. —William J. Locke.

"OH, joy, joy, joy!" The girl in the slit skirt kicked a slender foot through a fluff of sea-green ruffles, which bellowed out like foam. "I am so fearfully thrilled and happy that I cannot realize in half an hour the orchestra will strike up and carriages begin to rumble and I am a debutante!"

"In half an hour exactly." An older girl beside the fire glanced up at a clock and smiled. "I hope, Natalie, you will be just as happy as you imagine you are going to be."

"How could I help being happy, Mrs. Pucker-Brow?" laughed the little sister. "Flowers enough have come to smother me, my frock is the most adorable thing ever made, and I look—you said so—adorable."

"You do, Natalie, dear, simply adorable." The older girl clasped the clinging fingers stretched out to meet her own. Every masculine heart in Washington will lie at your feet tonight."

"As they did at yours three years ago. Of course, you are still one of the beauties. Aunt Matilde says——"

"What?" questioned the older sister abruptly. "That you were not only a beauty but the blithest, merriest, craziest thing alive, just as I am tonight. Now you are solemn and quiet as if you were thinking of old age and"—the girl in the slit skirt shivered—"of other horrid things."

"Aunt Matilde spoke the truth."

"Tell me," pleaded the girl of eighteen, "tell me about your debut. Remember, I don't know the world. I was in that French school when you came out."

"Why,"—her sister's eyes were fixed upon the glowing coals,—"there is nothing to tell, dear, except the stories all debutantes tell."

"Aunt Matilde says that you could have married—a Russian Prince." The girl's voice was an awestruck whisper.

"I suppose I could, only I did not want to."

"Why?"

"Because I want to respect and—love a husband."

"The Russian Prince was not the only one?"

"No, there were others, rich, or with a name—an old name—as if a name counted." The girl shrugged her shoulders. "Aunt Matilde had me nearly married, then I told her the truth."

"Is there some one you really care for?" whispered the little dubutante.

"If we were not the nieces of the millionaire Mrs. Gregg and dependent on her and shut away from everyone except people who have money or position or a name, I should have married—long ago and been very happy."

"Who is he?"

"A civil engineer."

"Isn't a man who works like that—— poor?"

"Yes."

"How poor?"

"He has two thousand a year."

"Two thousand!" repeated the girl in the foamy frock. "Why, my clothes this season cost more than that."

"They cost four times two thousand."

"Then how could you live?"

"Happily," answered the older girl, in a quiet voice. "Very happily."

"You could not live in our set?"

"I don't want to." Her sister leaped to her feet, pacing the room with quick footsteps. "I am tired of our set tired of its idleness, its show, its vanity, its pretences, its falsehood. Nobody dares to be real. People are not real even when they are alone. I am not real while I talk to you now. I would give everything in the world to get away from it and go to one quiet little corner where I could be happy and busy and—loved. The corner is waiting for me and——"

"Then why," whispered Natalie, "why don't you——"

"Because I am not brave enough. Besides, perhaps I am mistaken. There, dearest, the orchestra is tuning up. "She bent forward to kiss the eager, flushed face before her. "They are waiting for these golden slippers of yours to lead in the dance. Now——let us forget everything except this—that you are just eighteen and that tonight our little world is waiting to do you honor and tonight is full of joy—for you."

Camphor

Many commodities which we see or use in our daily life have interesting histories. Camphor is one of those. It is obtained from three different varieties of the laurel tree, which grow chiefly in Formosa, Japan and Borneo. I have a piece of camphor wood in my possession that was cut more than sixty years ago and it gives off the same pungent odor now that it did when fresh. In producing the commercial article, the wood is cut into chips and boiled. Over the kettle an inverted, dome-shaped vessel is placed and the gum or crystals collect on its inner surface. This is the camphor gum you see in the drug-stores; the oil is simply drawn off the liquid in which the chips are boiled. Both products have extensive medicinal use. In Borneo there are many extremely old trees, in the cracks and fissures of which the gum naturally collects, just as pitch or rosin would in a pine tree. This kind of camphor is many times more valuable than the distilled gum and is probably much stronger. Besides being destructive to moths, camphor is used generally in liniments and internal medicines. Like everything else, it is said that the supply is diminishing and that some means of conservation will have to be practiced in the near future.

THE subject for our talk last month was simple diarrhea, and this month we take up entero-colitis, or inflammatory diarrhea, and we mean by that a diarrhea which presents febrile reaction at some period of its course and is marked by great constitutional disturbances, and with mucous and blood in the stools. The presence of mucous or blood in the stools are proofs of an inflamed condition of the intestinal mucous membrane. This disease is one of the most common causes of infant mortality. Many of the deaths accredited to cholera infantum are caused by entero-colitis, as when the baby goes through the cholera infantum safely, but following this a long, obstinate, exhausting diarrhea sets in, which is, in truth, an inflammatory diarrhea. A large proportion of the cases of summer diarrhea may begin as mere functional disturbances of the intestines, but sooner or later become the disease we are now considering. It is one of the most important diseases of babies, especially in this country, where we have our long summer heat, and in some of our large cities its prevalence and fatality raise it to the rank of almost a pestilence. The two principal causes are improper food and the heat of summer. The improper food may be the mother's milk, if unwholesome, or it may be some unsuitable kind of food. Entero-colitis occurs more often in babies kept on foods than those who are given an exclusive milk diet until they are six months old. If the mother's milk is healthy it is rare for nursing babies to have entero-colitis, until weaned or some disturbance from teething. A common cause is feeding baby too hearty food, too rich for its weak digestion. It is not merely the quality but the quantity of food given that is injurious to babies. Over-feeding has always been recognized as a fruitful source of bowel complaints of early life. Another cause is the preparation of the food in too thick and rich a manner, thereby overtasking the stomach intended, during the early months, to receive the thin milk supplied by nature.

The extreme heat in summer is a common cause, and the months of July and August furnish by far the largest proportion of the cases. The effect of season is here so striking that it cannot be doubted as being one of the causes. Whether heat alone may act in this way upon the system of the baby is not proven, but it certainly acts by the noxious gases products of the decomposition of animal and vegetable substances, therefore clean homes, homes where the garbage is properly cared for, lessen the danger of its causation.

The most common cause after improper food and heat is teething, and while the evolution of the teeth through the gums is a normal physiological process, it is a powerful predisposing cause of diarrhea and entero-colitis. There are two things we may safely assume to be true: first, an unhealthy food, one incompetent to furnish to the body what it needs for the purposes of nutrition is sure to cause the disorder we are considering, no matter how favorable may be the circumstances in other respects in which the child is placed; second, the child may be fed the best breast milk in the world, or the most correct artificial food, but neither will save a baby from the disorder if it lives in a badly ventilated house, or on a filthy street in a large city during the hot weather.

Symptoms of entero-colitis are at first restlessness, and fretfulness, sighing, moaning in the sleep, does not eat as usual and after a few days the diarrhea and other abdominal symptoms appear. The frequency of the stools vary from six or eight to twenty-five in a day in severe cases, and are usually green, acid and contain whitish particles. The abdomen is distended, and the baby will draw up its legs, and cry out if you touch it. The baby is feverish, has very rapid pulse, 120 to 140, vomits several times a day, and the features look drawn, emaciated, and in severe cases the child soon looks as if it had been sick for months. The duration of disease is uncertain, but usually fifteen days. Entero-colitis is a serious disease, but in babies who have passed the first teething their chances of recovery are, as a rule, good. The unfavorable symptoms are great frequency of stools, violent vomiting, rigidity of limbs, paralysis or convulsions.

The prophylactic treatment is very important and includes attention to habitation, dress and diet. Get the baby in as cool and clean a place as possible, dress it so it will feel the heat as little as possible, and feed it on proper food. Of course the majority of babies, sick or well, have to remain in the homes of their parents, no matter where we live, but if we could choose an ideal place for them to spend the summer we would prefer a high interior locality rather than the seaside; but the most favorable locality will not protect baby if nursing deficient, unhealthy breast or fed improper food.

If baby is eating solid food the mother and nurse must not allow it to have a variety of vegetables, especially berries.

As soon as the baby shows any signs of intestinal disturbance, lessen its food; this should be done, whether nursing or taking artificial food; dilute the artificial food, also the milk for bottle fed baby.

Give teaspoonful doses of castor oil, to clear out bowels of any offending contents, and if baby seems to be in a great deal of pain you may put in one drop of tincture of opium; poultices or camphorated oil covered with flannel, may be applied to abdomen. The warm bath is helpful, two or three times a day if baby is not too weak, and it is a good plan to wrap baby in muslin sheet and over this a light flannel blanket and allow it to lie on lap or on bed for half hour after bath.

Subnitrate of bismuth, in one-grain doses, to babies under one year old, every two or three hours is helpful and may be given with a little sugar.

Dovers powder in doses of one-eighth of a grain every three hours, if there is great pain, frequency of stools or very nervous or restless condition. This must be used with caution, and stopped if child shows any degree of drowsiness.

Subject for next month, Summer Diseases of Babies—Continued.

Questions and Answers

POOR CIRCULATION.—My baby is eleven months old, weighs eighteen pounds, sleeps fairly well, no indigestion or constipation, but turns blue if I take him outdoors. He is very thin, pale, delicate looking and takes cold easily. He has no teeth, but gums are swollen and white. Would you advise taking him out of doors regardless, and should I have gums lanced? I nurse and feed him also.

MRS. L. D., Pittsburg, Pa.

A.—I should wean baby and put him on modified milk. By all means get him out of doors, dressing him just warm enough to keep him warm. Have gums lanced if swollen. Give your baby small doses of Neoferrum, and Maltine and Cod Liver Oil.

DANDRUFF.—Please give me a remedy for dandruff on baby's head. MRS. N. S., White Hall, Ill.

A.—Anoint head thoroughly with sweet oil and after several hours carefully comb out with fine comb; apply a little sulphur ointment once in a while.

UMBILICAL HERNIA.—I am writing for advice in regard to my four-year-old girl, who has had hernia ever since she was three months old. Have tried trusses without result; the protrusion is as large as small oak nut. MRS. M. V. W., Columbia, N. C.

A.—The majority of these cases are cured by wearing a large button, well padded and held in place by adhesive plaster. Take a button large as silver quarter, put convex or rounded surface, and press protrusion back into place. Have her wear this for months, changing while child is lying down. She should also wear elastic abdominal band over this to prevent pressure when coughing or sneezing.

THRUSH.—Two years ago, while nursing baby who had thrush, my breast became infected but it got well. Now I am nursing my six-months-old baby who has thrush, and my breasts are bad again. What can I do for them? MRS. J. D. O., Thomasville, Ga.

A.—Thrush is an inflammation of the mucous membrane of tongue and mouth in babies not getting proper food and nourishment. Wean baby, put it on modified milk, give baby Maltine and Cod Liver Oil. Locally, for both, wash parts with Dakin's solution, follow with wash containing Glycothymoline, teaspoonful to tablespoonful of warm water. Would use hot fomentations on breasts to relieve congestion and inflammation.

SPASMS WHILE TEETHING.—Is there any remedy for children that have spasms when they are cutting teeth? My six-months-old boy is constipated, has no teeth, but seems very nervous. I feed him three times a day, as he does not seem to nurse enough to satisfy him. Are spasms inherited? MRS. C. P., Warsaw, Mo.

A.—The remedy for spasms is to quickly put baby in warm water bath, get movement from bowels with suppository, cold applications to head if feverish, have gums lanced freely if swollen. Should wean baby if you have not enough milk, as mixed feeding is unsatisfactory. No, spasms are not inherited, but if parents are nervous, the baby may show the same characteristics.

INDIGESTION.—My eleven-months-old boy, who is still nursing, cries most of the time with colic. I have plenty of milk, but am feeding him custards, broths, glass of cow's milk. How much longer should I nurse him? I am troubled with constipation and backache. What can I do for myself? MRS. E. W., Kibbie, Mich.

A.—Should wean baby at once, as I do not think your milk is what he needs. His diet should consist mostly of milk, but you may cautiously give him stale wheat bread toasted, strained oatmeal gruel, custards, broths, not greasy. For yourself get some Fluid Extract of Cascara Sagrada, and take teaspoonful doses often enough to keep bowels regular. Take ten-grain dose of Sodium Salycylate after each meal, and drink plenty of water between meals.

SORE MOUTH.—Can you give me any help for my twenty-months-old baby, as he has had sore mouth since he was three months old, and I have tried everything for relief? I still nurse him, but have to give him calomel often. His teeth are rotten, and he has been sick all his life, but my own health is not good.

MRS. V. B., Hamburg, Ark.

A.—Wean your baby at once, give him milk, stale wheat bread toasted, meat juice, oatmeal gruel strained. Stop your calomel, give teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia for bowels. Give two drops of Syrup of Iodide of Iron three times a day. Sponge out mouth with Dakin's solution, followed with a wash made by putting teaspoonful of Glycothymoline in tablespoonful of warm water.

SORE NAVEL.—We have a two-months-old baby girl who is fat and healthy, weighs eighteen pounds, but for a little while has had sore navel, discharges like a boil, and is hard for an inch around it. What can we do for it? MRS. J. P., Whiteside, Mo.

A.—Should wash navel with Dakin's solution then dust on a little calomel, powdered. If there is much swelling should apply antiphlogistine.

VOMITING BABY.—What causes my two-months-old baby to vomit sour milk? If nursing mother's bowels are regular and baby's are constipated, what would you do? What should mother's diet be while nursing baby? MRS. R. M. L., Monument, Kans.

A.—The baby may vomit from nursing too fast or too often. The mother should take some simple laxative like Fluid Extract of Cascara Sagrada in teaspoonful doses often enough to keep baby's bowels regular. The mother need not go onto any diet, only avoiding acids and foods that cause gas and indigestion, but she should drink more or less milk.

COLIC.—My five-months-old baby does not gain, has weighed fourteen pounds for two months, and is troubled with colic. I am feeding him Eagle brand of milk, he is constipated and has a great deal of mucous in the stools. MRS. A. A. M., Jerseyville, Ill.

A.—I should put baby on modified cow's milk, giving him half milk, and water with tablespoonful of lime-water, and half teaspoonful of sugar of milk in each feeding. Give him teaspoonful doses of milk of magnesia often enough to keep bowels regular.

HEADACHE AND CONSTIPATION.—I am the mother of ten healthy living children and am now nursing a two-months-old baby. Will a mother having lots of milk cause her headache? I am badly constipated and have hemorrhoids all the time.

MRS. H. O. R., Kershaw, S. C.

A.—Get some Nujol and take it in teaspoonful doses often enough to keep bowels regular, as this will relieve headache and constipation. For the hemorrhoids, try sitting in very warm water to relieve local congestion and after each movement insert an Iodex suppository. No, abundance of milk will not cause headache.

RENAL CALCULI, OR GRAVEL.—Will you please tell me what to do for gravel, as I have it very badly every month? Will some of the sisters send me the recipe for "brown spots," as I have mislaid my February COMFORT? Should like to hear from some of the sisters or mothers, so please print my name in full.

MRS. MAE MILLS, Sugartree, Tenn.

A.—By gravel we mean the passing of concretions of uric acid salts in the urine, which is painful and irritating. Should take Urotropin in seven-grain doses, night and morning, in glass of water, also halfounce doses of liquor potassii citrates every three hours, cream of tartar, teaspoonful doses in glass of water, also Lithia Spring Water, or any alkaline water.

INDIGESTION.—My four-months-old baby has very sick spells, passes a lot of green slime, and mucous, also breaks out all over his body with small pimples with white tops. I feed baby cow's milk and water.

MRS. H. L., Homer City, Pa.

A.—The food does not agree with baby; should give him occasionally teaspoonful dose of castor oil; dilute milk with boiled water, adding tablespoonful of lime-water to each feeding. It might be good judgment to try other cow's milk than the one you are using, as often it is the fault of the cow's milk rather than the baby's digestion.

cured me of a weakness in the lungs. For 12 years we lived at Phoenix, Arizona, that city located in a miniature "Valley of Eden"—so called because the plant life is similar. It is a beautiful spot to me but to me the mountains and desert are finer. I am a great lover of nature. The mountains with their great deposits of ore and their water-sheds which furnish life-giving fluid for plant life in the valleys and the dry, pure air of the mountains that gives health to the thousands who seek it in Arizona and the eternal sunshine, one owes all this to the mountains. "The mountains are all the Heaven one needs in June," said Jean Stratton Porter. "June or any other time," I say.

But all of Arizona's curative powers do not come from above the earth. From the mountains come hot springs and there are also great deposits of mineral which is used in its natural state and cannot be compounded by man. This cures all sorts of inflammation and is not used for anything else, except to build up the system. Many tuberculars cannot eat. It seems to give them a good appetite and cures all inflammation of the stomach so those who have had stomach troubles for years can eat anything. You wouldn't believe it if I told you how many old sores have been cured with it. Some inside and some outside and many called cancers by physicians. I think as many use it for pyorrhea as for anything and it cures every time. One friend of mine said she never expected to eat meat again, had not for years. It seems wonderful that God would provide this cure and put it out in Arizona just where it is most needed because of the thousands of sick who go there each year. I have never heard of a name for this mineral. It will no doubt have one some day.

"The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world." If it is true why is the world so wicked today? Do mothers want it? Public sentiment will do anything. It will clean up the movies, for instance. Let's do away with those that are degrading to children and adult alike. I'm not a prude nor a Puritan but I never compromise with the devil. No one except a person who denies sin will say there is a moral to be gotten from every picture. Perhaps every picture has a moral, but it is missed because of the suggestiveness and the filthiness which predominates in many pictures. I have no cradle to rock but I have more important business than being "amused" by such pictures. There are good, educational pictures, splendid from the standpoint of entertainment and education. Some one will want to argue on "tother side," I do not accept it so there! "Square jawed cat!" I hear some one say. Wrong again! Slim face, fluffy brown hair, disposition so-so, large mouth with laugh wrinkles all around, large grey eyes that look through and beyond. Eyes are more than eyes. They are windows to the soul. I hope mine reveal a soul. 'Tis certain that they reveal to me the souls of others.

I'd like to say something about giving the girl—and especially the boy, a room of his own and something of what a room of my very own meant in my life after mother was gone, but it would take too much room. I'd like to say something about boy-and-girl sweethearts. I have a boy and he has always had a sweetheart. Should mothers encourage or discourage this tendency of the young boy or girl to have favorites? I have never discouraged it. I have never teased. A sweetheart is as common as a piece of furniture in this family.

How many mothers believe in spending a little time on the study of the child and his development? I wish every mother would. It would help her to understand that boy or girl and to meet these things and solve them. I could write a book on this and may some day.

If there are some letters that are more worth while and I feel sure there are I shall not feel hurt if not printed. I will answer letters of any whom I can serve but do not write me please, unless I can be of use to you in some way for I am busy, but never too busy to help when it is in my power. I especially sympathize with the sick and bereaved and those who have family troubles but I believe it is possible to have peace, no matter what the trouble. I did not say Joy, I said Peace.

Yes, I live in California. And I'm not blind. I see the beauty but you have heard so much about it no use repeating. If one could live on scenery alone one could live lavishly in California. We have been here but a short time and we like California. If any one wants to know about the climate and etc. and will enclose a stamp, I will answer.

May God bless you all and long live COMFORT and all of its departments.

MRS. H. E. GROOM.

NEWTON, OHIO.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

May I come in for a little while, as I am alone most of the time?

I have read the letter from "Worried Mother" who asks how to treat "that kind of a girl," the girl that your boy has wronged, yet you think she is not good enough for him and your family. Yet you have said that up to this time she was a good girl. Have you a daughter of your own? How would you feel if such a thing should happen to her? I know your heart would ache. Then why not think of how this poor girl and her mother must feel?

Why don't you sit down and have a heart-to-heart talk with your boy? Then you could find out if he loves her or not. If he does not, even then the child should have the right to be legitimate. Try to do your part and make things as near right as you can for the child will be your grandchild whether he marries the mother or not.

MRS. BOLES.

VENA, R. R. A, Box 83, COLO.

DEAR COMFORT FRIENDS:

COMFORT has come again and found us all busy as switch engines and harvest on. I must not complain for the farmer is always busy and in a hurry.

I enjoy the sisters' letters, and find much help in them. I take several papers but COMFORT comes the nearest to being the right paper.

ELIZABETH ALVA CRIST.

For sleeve-holders I cut slices from inner tube (of the car tire) and cover with pretty ribbon or crochet a cover for same. They are very neat and last longer than any other elastic.

I have three boys and one baby girl. Am sending photo of baby. Her name is Elizabeth Alva. Age one year.

Would like to hear from sisters who have com'c recitations to exchange.

Will someone give me the address of the lady whose maiden name was Marie Zoe Reynolds?

MRS. ETHYL DUNCANSON CRIST.

COLUMBUS, 2639 Adams Ave., OHIO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I would like to get into your COMFORT Corner but having been a subscriber only a short time, maybe I don't deserve it, but since I have started taking this magazine I don't want to stop, ever.

How many of the sisters belong to the Standard Bearers? I will tell you how we made almost one hundred dollars and in a very easy way.

Each member made twelve small aprons and put a clever little note into the pocket of each one. These were mailed to friends, far and near, no matter whether they belonged to any church or not. The verse was an invitation to attend an Apron party, provided the small apron was returned with as many pennies in the pocket as was the person inches around the waist. At this party we had a nice musical program and served chocolate and wafers. We also sold large aprons that the members had made and donated. The evening was very enjoyable and we could hardly believe our eyes when we saw how much money we had.

At the church I attend there is a class of young women, from twenty to thirty-five years of age. We are trying to find ways of making money and I thought maybe some of the COMFORT sisters could help us out. I am sure there are unique ways of raising funds for church societies if we only knew of them.

Sincerely yours, MRS. R. M. [illegible]

[illegible], OKLA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I am sending my grandson's picture which I want to see in COMFORT. His name is Ralph Lyndon and he was five months old when this was taken and weighed twenty-three pounds.

Sincerely yours, MRS. H. B. ARMSTRONG.

RALPH LYNDON.

Mrs. Armstrong.—If I were the grandmother of such a fine boy as Ralph Lyndon I'm sure I would tell more about him than just his name, age and weight, but perhaps you believe in letting us see for ourselves—and we do.—Ed.

LA FAYETTE, ALA.

DEAR READERS:

A sister asks how old a child should be when he enters school. Perhaps I am as well qualified to answer that question as any mother of four because our four have been each a distinct "specimen." I would answer that everything depends on the child, whether he has been normally healthy, and the amount or kind of training he has had at home. We put each of our children in school as soon as we think he is mentally and physically able to cope with all the conditions of public school life.

Our oldest was ill during his babyhood, didn't begin to grow and develop as a child should till about two years old, and mothers who have had "sickly" babies know that it takes a long time to become normal, if they ever do. So we didn't start him to school till he was eight, although he entered the second grade. He is now in the fourth grade and is on the honor roll every month.

Our second had an attack of pneumonia when eight months old, and it affected his lower limbs, so he didn't walk till he was eighteen months old. After that he grew very fast and was strong for his age, so he entered the second grade at seven, only a year behind brother. He also is on the monthly honor roll as is his little sister who was scarcely ever ill, and who entered the second grade at six. Her grades are highest of the three. Our youngest is four now, and when this school year ends will have completed the first year's work. But under our state laws he cannot enter school until six, so he will probably enter the third grade at that age.

None of them are bookworms. I defy anyone to produce four more noisy, boisterous children than ours.

As soon as they can handle them, they are given building blocks with pictures of animals, letters of alphabet and figures on them. They have dominoes, checkers, alphabet books and later easy primers. They always have access to pencils, paper, colors, patterns to draw easy figures from, scissors, a home-made blackboard and crayon, etc. And we try to answer every question they ask with as much care and consideration as if the fate of nations depended on it.

I won't take up any more of your time, Mrs. Wilkinson, but will come again sometime if you would care to have me.

[illegible], GRAYSVILLE, TENN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

It is over twenty years since I wrote to COMFORT and many times when I have been enjoying the letters I have felt that I would like to write again.

In reading the letter from a sister about her boys quarreling I felt like telling her how I seem to have cured my two girls of that bad habit. I have a piece of leather on a stick made like what I use for killing flies, and I told my girls that every time I heard an angry word I would have them put out their hand and I would give them one hard strike on the palm. It has worked like magic. The hurt isn't bad but it makes them feel ashamed of quarreling. Try it and see how it works with your children.

My husband and I have reared four children of our own, all married and gone. Then we took a brother and sister; they too are married and have their home. Then we took two girls, sisters, the oldest thirteen, and if they marry as young as the others did we may be left alone again but I hope not. I am now sixty-six years old.

I enjoy all your letters and expect to take COMFORT as long as I live.

With love and best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters, MRS. JAMES GLEE.

ELKO, NEVADA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

The wind and snow are driving along at a terrific rate,—one of those dismal days when I feel the need of a friendly chat with some one. And what could I find better than our big circle of sisters?

We live on a 120-acre homestead just a mile from town and during the month of January my [illegible] months-old son and I were snowed in for four weeks. We didn't see or hear anyone during that time except "friend hubby" and he was at the store from 7 A. M. until 6.30 P. M. We haven't been out now (Feb. 9) for a week and from the looks of the weather we may be in for another four weeks. I can scarcely see the chicken house through the blowing snow.

I have been married eight years to a husband whom I consider above the average, and have lived in Elko seven and one-half years. We lost a beautiful little dark-eyed girl, two and a half years old, nearly three years ago, and I felt that I didn't have a great deal to live for. It was my first experience with the Grim Reaper, but don't think I let it spoil my life or made my home unbearable, which I have seen happen, though I don't think their hearts were more empty than my own or others have been.

I realized that work would be the best thing to take my mind off my trouble. Prior to the baby's death I had been working with my husband for a wholesale produce firm so I came back (the baby died in a hospital in Salt Lake City) and went to work harder than ever. A month and a half later I was offered a half interest in the produce department of one of the retail stores. As I was to be manager, do my own buying and hire what help I needed, and had no capital to furnish, I accepted the proposition. I knew it was just what I needed as I would have to meet the public all the time and would have no time to think of my sorrow. And it did help wonderfully.

A year later my contract having expired, I sold my half interest and opened a store of my own, groceries and produce. A few months later my husband sold out his interests in the wholesale business and took over the management of the store. Now my time, housework and chickens keep me so well occupied that it is only days like this that I feel "sorter blue and blue."

but I had flattered myself that I also should be missed."

"Pardon me, if my words conveyed to you the idea that you would not," Star said, quickly. "You have been most kind, Mr. Meredith, and I shall most certainly miss your companionship and your friendly attentions. But," she added, "will Grace go with you? You have not yet told me, and I have not heard her say anything about leaving."

She hoped thus to ward off what she feared was coming, and turn the conversation in another channel.

"No; Grace will remain for another week. But, Miss Gladstone—Star," he began, desperately, "I could not leave without seeking this private interview with you to learn my fate. You have called my attentions 'friendly.' Have you not realized that they have been vastly more than that? Have you not seen that I have grown to love you madly, idolatrously? You are modest as a violet, my bright Star; and although I have tried to win some sign of answering affection from you, yet you have not given me one. You have evaded my every look, my every word of love. But, my beautiful darling, it seems as if my true heart must find in yours a fond return. You will tell me tonight, will you not, dear, that you will give yourself to me? Star, how shall I tell you of the depth of my love?—how you have become so necessary to me, that if you should send me away without hope, the future would hold nothing to tempt me, nothing to make life worth the living. When I held you in my arms last Wednesday, and believed that your life had been endangered—when you lay unconscious upon my breast, close to my heart, so white and still, so exactly as if you were dead, I said to myself that I could not, I cared not to live, if you were taken from me. My love, look up into my eyes, lay your hand in mine, and tell me you will give yourself to me."

He stopped in the path and waited for her answer—waited for her to lay her hand in his, as he had asked her to do, and bid him hope to be the happiest man in the universe.

But her beautiful golden head was bent, as if weighted with some heavy care or sorrow. The star-like face was pale and downcast, and the lovely eyes, into which he longed to read an answering tale of love, were hidden by their white lids and curling lashes.

"Star," he breathed, a note of keen pain in his tone, "do not tell me that I must give up my bright dream of joy."

"Mr. Meredith," she answered, looking up at him with sudden resolution, "forget for a little while what you have just said to me, and listen, while I read you a page out of my own heart."

A look of suffering came into his eyes, his lips trembled, and he breathed heavily, but he answered:

"I cannot 'forget,' but I will 'listen,' as you wish."

"Nearly two years ago," Star began, "I came to America in the ————, a vessel that sailed from Liverpool to New York. Perhaps you remember that it was lost at sea. I was one of the few who were saved, and afterward picked up by the ————, another homeward bound vessel. As I was lifted from the lifeboat to the deck of the noble craft, I fainted from exhaustion, and fell into the arms of a stranger, who bore me to a stateroom and gave me into the care of a stewardess. I met him a day or two afterward on the deck. He was a noble, manly-looking gentleman, some four years my senior. We were thrown much into each other's society during the remainder of the voyage, and there came into my heart during that time a feeling for him that will prevent me from ever loving another while I live. When we landed we parted as friends, though we exchanged souvenirs, and he expressed the hope that we should meet again. A few months later we did meet, our friendship was renewed, and soon ripened into something deeper—in fact, he won my heart entirely. We were betrothed, and for a few days earth became a paradise to me. I could have staked my life upon his truth and honor, and I would have defended him with my last breath had any one assailed his fair fame or doubted his allegiance to me. But I could not doubt the evidence of my own senses, and he proved himself a traitor in my very presence. He played me false before the vows which he had uttered to me were scarcely grown cold upon his lips. I spurned him with scorn; I denounced him as the traitor and coward which I knew him to be; but, oh, Mr. Meredith, strange as it may seem to you, I—I love him still. Perhaps it is unmaidenly in me to tell you this, perhaps it betrays weakness and a lack of proper dignity on my part; but I feel that I owe it to you, to make you understand how impossible it is for me to reciprocate your affection. He won my girlish heart, he bound me irrevocably to him by the power of his will and the charm of his oily tongue, and I can never love another. You will say that he is unworthy such constancy, or even of a regret. I know he is, and yet while I own it, my soul is reaching after him with all the strength of a deathless love. I began to fear, a week ago, that you were entertaining feelings for me which would bring sorrow upon us both. You say that I have evaded you. I have done so; I have tried to show you that the hopes which I feared you were entertaining could never be realized, and I wish that you had never spoken the words which you have tonight; for I know—you know, that you could never be satisfied to take any one to your heart who was always turning from you to another, who, although she knew she was loving unworthily, would not yet have the power to keep her affections from straying from you, and who could not keep her vows of allegiance to you, for such vows, if spoken, would be but mockery. Mr. Meredith, you could never be satisfied with such a wife as that," she concluded, in a voice which shook with emotion.

"No, Miss Gladstone," he answered, sorrowfully. "I love you too fondly, too devotedly, to be content with anything save an affection as strong and true as my own. But," with a note of earnest appeal in his tone, "could I not win you by and by? Could I not teach you to love me by proving to you that I am worthy of your love?"

Star shook her head sadly.

"I know that you are worthy at this moment,' she said. "I have the deepest respect for you, and value you as a friend; but nothing—no one can ever win the love which I must always bear for Archibald Sherbrooke. He has broken my heart and ruined my life; for I can never be the wife of any worthy man, since I will not live a lie."

"Where is he—where is this coward who has so imposed upon you, ruined your life, and proved faithless to his troth? Tell me, that I may go and brand him the knave and villain that he is!" Ralph Meredith cried, in hot indignation.

"I do not know where he is," Star answered. "I have never seen him since that night when I told him that I had discovered his treachery. That was nearly a year ago. I never expect to meet him again—I never wish to meet him again. I desire to ignore him—at least, to all outward appearances; and if he possesses such an attribute as a conscience, his punishment must come some time. "But," she went on, in a voice of pain, "I hope no one else will ever learn to love me, for I cannot endure the thought that I shall spoil other lives as mine has been spoiled. Oh, Mr. Meredith, I am sorry if I have unconsciously done you a wrong. Pray forget me if you can, and——"

"That I can never do," he interrupted, gently, for he saw that she was deeply moved; "but I will try and be content if you will allow me still to be your friend."

"Thank you," she returned, while she wiped the tears which were falling fast; "it will be a great comfort to me if you will permit me to regard you as such. I feared I should incur your contempt by the confession I have made tonight; but I could better endure that than that your future should be ruined by hoping against hope."

"Contempt!" he repeated, earnestly; "such a feeling I could never entertain for you; you have, instead, my deepest sympathy and respect. But if I ever meet and know the wretch who has played you false, let him beware; for I will surely make him repent most bitterly his treachery and baseness toward you," he concluded, fiercely.

CHAPTER XXXI.

A NOBLE RESOLUTION.

"You will remember that you have promised that I am still to be your friend; you will not avoid me and deny me the pleasure of your society because of what I have told you tonight?" Ralph pleaded, as he and Star drew near the entrance of the park, and knew that they would soon be rejoined by his sister and Mr. Rosevelt.

"You shall still be my friend. I will not avoid you if you will promise me that you will build no false hopes upon our friendship," she said.

"How can I, when you tell me that there is no hope?" he asked, yet his voice trembled and was full of pain.

Then they passed out at the gate, where they found Mr. Rosevelt and Grace awaiting them.

Both saw at a glance that the interview had been a sorrowful one, and Miss Meredith was bitterly disappointed, for she had trusted that Ralph would be able to win the bright, beautiful girl for his wife.

Mr. Rosevelt surmised the cause of Star's rejection of his suit, and sighed heavily, for the young man had been a favorite with him, and he would have been glad to give her to him.

They parted at the door of the hotel, Ralph bidding them good by there, as he was to leave early in the morning, and Star knew by the way he wrung her hand that he was bidding farewell to hope as well.

When they reached their private parlor, she went directly to Mr. Rosevelt's side and laid her hand upon his arm. Her face was flushed and sad, and he saw at once that she was very unhappy.

"What is it, my starling?" he asked, taking her hand in both of his, and speaking very tenderly.

"Uncle Jacob, I want to go home," she said, wearily.

"Bless you, child! you shall go wherever you like," he said, in surprise, and regarded her anxiously.

"I want to go where you and I can be by ourselves, and where I cannot do any mischief," she said, with a sob of pain, and he knew beyond a doubt that Ralph Meredith had proposed and been rejected.

"Mischief! tut, tut, little one! What has made you so unhappy? Have you sent our young friend away in sorrow?"

Star nodded her head in reply; she could not find voice to answer him.

"He is a fine young man—he is a worthy young man," Mr. Rosevelt said, gently.

"Oh, I know it, Uncle Jacob; but—my heart is dead, and it can never live again. Don't blame me, please—you know all about it, and you know that I could not help it and be true to him and myself," she returned, in deep distress.

"You have done everything to make me happy," she went on, a little more calmly, "and I thought I was beginning to be content and to enjoy life once more; but I cannot endure many scenes like what transpired tonight. Let us go home, where I can go to work again, and in my duties there forget, if possible, the misery of the past, which I have been made to live over again tonight."

"We will leave Newport tomorrow, if you wish," Mr. Rosevelt said, after a little thought; "but we will not go back to New York just yet—we will spend two or three weeks in sightseeing first."

He then outlined a trip that seemed to Star to be delightful.

The next morning she sought Miss Meredith, and confessed, with many tears, her rejection of her brother.

"I knew he would tell you," she said, "but I cannot bear that you should blame me, Grace. I have not meant to wrong your brother, and I would give much to make him as happy and free from pain as he was before he knew me. Do not take your friendship from me on account of it, for I need it more than I ever did before."

And Grace Meredith, not knowing all, kissed her tenderly, while she thought in her heart, "Perhaps I can help to win her for Ralph even yet if I am patient."

"Do not grieve," she said gently. "I know you have intended no wrong. You cannot help being beautiful and attractive; you cannot help it if people will love you. I do not blame you, dear, in the least, and I am sure I should not think of breaking our friendship, which has been so exceedingly pleasant. Ralph did tell me something of this last night, and of course I am sorry for him, for he is a very dear brother, and a noble fellow, too; but these affairs of the heart, you know," she concluded, smiling and flushing, for she knew something about it herself, "are entirely beyond our control."

"Thank you, Grace," Star said, gratefully, although the trouble did not fade out of her azure eyes; "you have lightened my burden considerably. It would have been more than I could bear to make an enemy of you."

"An enemy, you dear little goose!" Grace cried. "Do you suppose I would be so foolish as to wish to drive you to marry my brother if you could not love him? I love you both too well for that; and now don't let me hear anything more about broken friendships, unless I do something to forfeit your respect, for it would cause me great sorrow to have anything mar our intimacy."

Star drew a long breath of relief.

"You are very good to me," she returned, "and now I have a little message to you from Uncle Jacob."

"A message from Mr. Rosevelt! Do let me have it, then, for it must be something good," Miss Meredith said, gayly. She longed to drive the clouds from her friend's face.

"We are going to leave Newport."

"Going to leave Newport! When?"

"Tomorrow."

"If that is your message, it is anything but a welcome one," Miss Meredith said, looking very much disturbed.

"Oh, but it isn't," Star replied; "I was to tell you of our plans. We are going from here to the White Mountains, from there to Montreal, down the St. Lawrence River and Lake Ontario to Niagara, and then home; and Uncle Jacob commissioned me to ask you to be our guest during the trip. Will you go, Grace?"

Miss Meredith looked thoughtful.

It would be a sudden start, but the trip offered great attraction, to say nothing of the pleasure she would experience in Star's and Mr. Rosevelt's society.

Ralph was gone, and if these friends should go also, she would be very lonely, notwithstanding she had many acquaintances here.

"I want you, Grace; please do not refuse," Star pleaded, as she hesitated, and she assented without further demur.

Accordingly, the next day, they all left Newport, and many blank faces and wistful eyes watched their departure, for they had formed a nucleus around which a brilliant circle had collected, and they would be sadly missed.

The trip occupied three weeks, and proved a most delightful one also.

"I think it is charming to travel in this way," Star said, one day while they were at Niagara; "just a few of us who enjoy each other, stopping when we choose, going on when we like, and having everything our own way. I think there is nothing so pleasant as traveling."

"How would you like to go to California and the Yosemite Valley?" Mr. Rosevelt asked.

"I think I should like it," she answered, enthusiastically.

"Will you go this fall?"

"Oh, Uncle Jacob, aren't you tired? Do you not need to go home and rest after so much dissipation?" the young girl asked, but her eyes sparkled and her cheeks flushed with anticipation.

"Do you call it dissipation to travel?" he asked, smiling at her eagerness. "I enjoy it almost more than anything else."

"'Almost more,'" Star repeated, quickly. "What would you enjoy more?"

"To see you perfectly happy," he replied, tenderly; "and," he added, "I believe that traveling does you fully as much good as anything else. We will go home and rest a week, then we will start for the far West. What do you say to my plan?"

"Well, if so much depends upon my decision—if I hold the fate of two such important people in my hands, I shall be obliged to say, we will go to California and be happy. But," she added, laughing, "I warn you both beforehand that I shall not be easily satiated; I shall want to go everywhere and see everything. Yes; we will go home and rest for a week, then turn our faces toward the 'Golden Gate,' and—'Westward, ho!'"

Knowledge and Cents

By Hilda Koppel

Copyright, 1922, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

ALL over this busy country there are women who have "made good" in various occupations. Some have gained recognition, others remain practically unkown.

Among the latter is Mrs. John A. Rawlins of Sycamore St., in New Orleans, who, with only a small amount of aid from her husband in his spare time, has made a huge success of her preserve "factory".

Mrs. Rawlins laid the foundation of her career in the kitchen of her aunt, a Southern housekeeper noted for her wonderful preserves.

Seven years ago, Mr. and Mrs. Rawlins were living in the little town of Biloxi, on the Gulf Coast. Mrs. Rawlins had "put up" two hundred jars of preserves for use in her own household, when certain circumstances caused her to consider selling them.

Taking a jar of pear preserves to the steward of one of the numerous summer hotels, she asked him to sample it with a view to purchasing. The man held the container up to the light and turned it around once or twice. Then he inquired as to the number of jars Mrs. Rawlins had on hand—he ordered them all, and asked that she "put up" some peaches for him.

"But," the preserve maker protested, "you haven't even tasted them."

"It's not necessary," the steward told her. "I know they're all right because they're so clear."

"That was what gave me the idea of going into it as a business," said Mrs. Rawlins with one of the rare smiles which light up her sweet, intelligent face.

"I thought that if I could sell my products on the Coast I could do the same in New Orleans," continued Mrs. Rawlins, "so when we moved here shortly afterward, I visited other stewards. They all gave me orders, with but two exceptions; one was a hotel which does its own preserving, the other,"—here Mrs. Rawlins smiled again—"recently that steward phoned me and ordered one hundred dozen jars."

The factory is merely a simply equipped shed in the back yard. The equipment consists of a sealing machine; rough shelves cover the walls from floor to ceiling, and many crates fill almost all the available space. Next year this remarkable woman intends to erect a larger building, and to increase her output.

July and January are the busy months in the preserve "factory." In the summer, figs, peaches and pears are "put up"; in winter, marmalade. In the busy season Mrs. Rawlins arises at five o'clock, and goes out to the "factory," where huge tubs of lime-water (in which the fruit is cleansed), and the syrup in which to cook it, are ready by the time the "raw" product arrives. The work continues until half-past five, when time is taken for a leisurely dinner. At night the jars are labeled. Mr. Rawlins' job is that of sealing the jars, while his wife makes the preserves.

"Thirteen motions of the hand go into the preparation of every jar from the time it is taken from the crate until it is loaded on the truck which delivers it to the different customers," said Mrs. Rawlins.

Every year the business has increased," Mrs. Rawlins went on. "In 1919 the output was five thousand jars; this year it was nine thousand. We used more than one thousand, seven hundred pounds of sugar. The output would have been larger if the fig crop had not been so poor."

Every club and hotel in New Orleans serves Mrs. Rawlins' delicious products in attractive quarter-pint size, which has been found the most convenient and sanitary for individual service. Many jars are shipped to hotels on the Gulf Coast and to other large cities, Louisville and Chicago among them.

"'Nothing by guess' is the principle I work on," Mrs. Rawlins declared. "Everything is counted, the same measurements are always used. For example, seven figs go into every individual fig jar."

So this woman, by using her knowledge of preserving, has turned it into dollars and cents, and stands out, a real success among the many women who have triumphed by their own efforts.

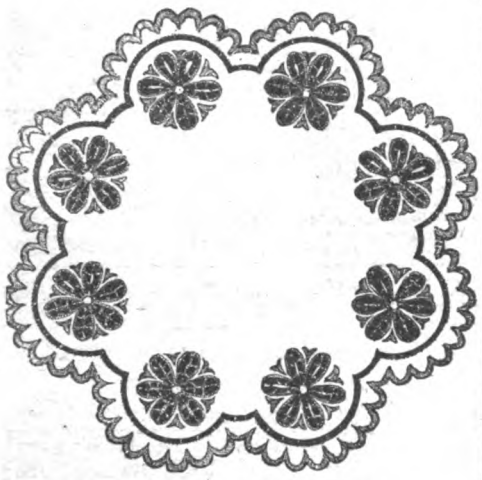
Good Ideas for Home and Personal Wear

Embroidered Doilies

THE second design for a small doily is simplicity itself. Almost anyone can draw the center circle and surround it with the corner designs shown.



The center is closely buttonholed with old blue mercerized floss, the corners being finished with the same stitch but worked some distance apart and over a strand of white rope cotton. On the little points between the centers use the old blue.

After this much of the work is completed, cut the linen out from under the corners, then cross the open spaces made with white threads and over these twist a blue.

Centerpiece in Color

The pattern illustrated below is one which can be planned if one has not any way of easily securing a stamped design.

To lay this pattern out first cut a perfect circle of 18 or 20 inches in diameter or in fact any size. Fold this three times and cut a half circle. Unfold and spread out carefully. Using a thimble for a guide and a sharp pencil, draw small scallops just inside of the line forming the eight scallops. Add the straight scallop line inside of these, which is closely worked over a padding cord with satin stitch.

CENTERPIECE IN COLORS.

Cut out six petal motifs and place one in each scallop.

Buttonhole stitch is used on the scallops and outlining with heavy rope silk in working the motifs.

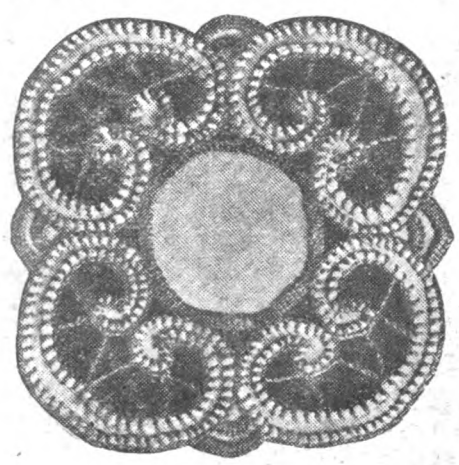
Color schemes, black satin or sateen with black edge, green scallop line, and yellow or orange motifs. Natural tone linen with blue edge, brown scallop line and white motifs with yellow centers. Natural tone linen with Swedish color combination. Red edge outlined with black on inside of scallops. Green cross-stitching on scallop line outlined on either side with gold. Blue motifs with yellow center. Either of these combinations are very attractive.

Fashionable Girdles

The new spring dresses are still on straight lines and the long-waisted effect secured by a girdle is very popular.

The fashionable girdles which are made of wooden beads and silk cords may be made at home for much less than a finished one will cost.

Black silk cord combined with colored beads make a girdle which can be used on dresses of different colors. For an attractive one of black cord and small round beads one will need seven and one-half yards of cord cut into three lengths and beads of two contrasting colors.



Cut the cord into three pieces, three inches from one end tie a knot, run on next to this a dark, a light and then a dark bead. Knot cord so as to hold closely. Leave three-inch space, make knot and repeat.

On other two cords, knot in one dark bead, so it will come just below light one, then these are held in place with black silk. This pattern can also be worked out with five strands of cord using five, three and one beads to form groups.

For a very Oriental looking girdle, choose a dull gold cord and some brightly colored beads in two or three shades and in two different shapes.

Cut cord for length and knot ends together and then start to string the beads.

The way the different colors are arranged must be left to individual taste, but it is a good plan to choose beads in a long and round shape, and use one long bead on each of four cords, two in one color and two in another, then pass all four cords through a round bead, knotting the cords just before and after passing them through the bead, to hold in place before stringing the next set of long beads.

Continue in this way until the girdle is complete, then knot the ends together and make two tassels. For these strings of smaller beads in the same colors used for the girdle will be required. The tassels should be about four inches long, with the beads knotted in place and the ends of cords knotted.

Form tassels by sewing the strings of cords together and fasten firmly to the end of the girdle, twisting a little of the cord around to cover the joining.

For summer frocks very dainty girdles can be made of light material, such as silk or soft ribbon, knotted at regular intervals and finished with bead tassels.

Another attractive arrangement is fashioned from lengths of different colored ribbons about an inch wide, plaited together and finished with gold or silver tassels. Yet others—and these are particularly dainty—are composed of five or six lengths of baby ribbon in various shades, knotted together every four inches and then passed through a large round bead.

Circular Edging

This lace fits perfectly smooth around an article and is especially designed for edging centerpieces or doilies.

Crocheted Bedspread

The pattern shown is especially designed for bedspread strips made of carpet warp. These are made long enough to cover the bed and pillows or just the length of the bed an extra is used for a pillow sham.

Using a crochet hook which will carry the carpet warp comfortably, begin by making a chain 97 sts, turn.

1st row—1 s c in 8th st from hook, ch 3, 1 d c in next 3rd st, ch 3, 1 s c in next 3rd st, ch 3, 1 d c in next 3rd st. Repeat making 15 closed lacets in all. Ch 8, turn.

CIRCULAR EDGING.

2nd row—1 d c on d c, ch 5, 1 d c on next d c. Repeat, thus making an open lacet over each closed lacet, ch 6, turn.

3rd row—1 s c in 3rd ch, ch 3, * 1 d c on d c, ch 3, 1 s c in 3rd ch, ch 3, 1 d c on d c *(from * to * make a closed lacet). Make 5 more closed lacets in this row, or 7 in all, then 1 blk or 6 d c over next open lacet, 7 closed lacets, ch 8, turn.

4th row—7 open lacets, 1 blk, 7 open lacets, ch 6, turn.

5th row—6 closed lacets, 3 blks, 6 closed lacets, ch 8, turn.

6th row—6 open lacets, 3 blks, 6 open lacets, ch 6, turn.

7th row—5 closed lacets, 2 blks, 1 closed lacet, 1 blk, ch 8, turn.

8th row—5 open lacets, 2 blks, 1 open lacet, 2 blks, ch 6, turn.

9th row—4 closed lacets, 1 blk, 5 closed lacets, 1 blk, 4 closed lacets, ch 8, turn.

10th row—4 open lacets, 1 blk, 5 open lacets, 1 block, 4 open lacets, ch 6, turn.

11th row—Same as 9th row.

12th row—Same as 10th row.

Repeat last two rows once more.

15th row—5 closed lacets, 2 blks, 1 closed lacet, 2 blks, 5 closed lacets, ch 8, turn.

16th row—Same as last row but with open lacets.

17th row—6 closed lacets, 3 blks, 6 closed lacets, ch 8, turn.

18th row—Same as last row with open lacets.

19th row—7 closed lacets, 1 blk 7 closed lacets.

20th row—Same as last with open lacets.

Next rows 15 closed lacets followed by row of 15 open lacets. Repeat these 2 rows 3 times.

27th row—5 closed lacets, 2 blks, 1 closed lacet, 2 blks, 5 closed lacets, ch 8, turn.

28th row—Same as last row with open lacets.

29th row—4 closed lacets, 1 blk, 2 closed lacets, 1 blk, 2 closed lacets, 1 blk, 4 closed lacets.

30th row—Same as last row with open lacets.

Repeat last two rows once.

33rd and 34th rows—Same as 27th and 28th rows.

Now 4 rows like 29th, 30th, 31st and 32nd rows.

39th row—Same as 27th and 28th rows.

Next 8 rows of closed then open lacets.

Repeat pattern from 3rd row.

Set together with strips of linen or plain unbleached cotton finished on either side with a hemstitched inch-wide hem.

Crocheted Wheels

These attractive patterns may be used in numberless ways and worked up in a variety of materials. Of either white or ecru crochet the large wheels joined together with the small ones worked up into most effective chair-back tidies and sofa pillows.

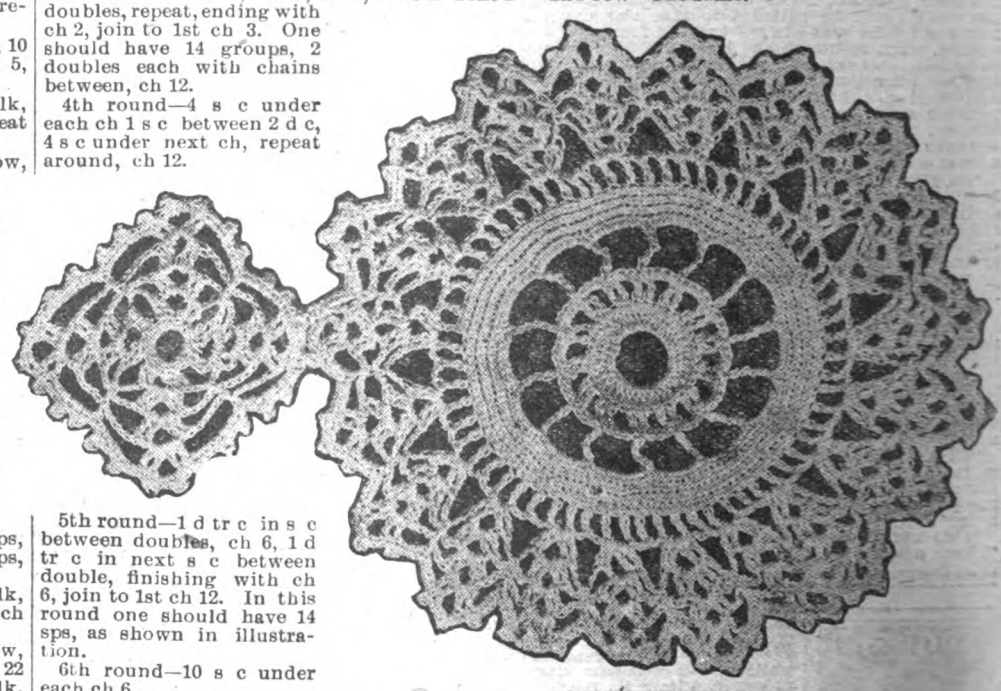
For the Large Wheel

Ch 12, join in ring, ch 3.

2nd round—56 d c into ring, join, ch 3.

3rd round—1 d c, ch 2, sk 2, 2 d c in next 2 doubles, repeat, ending with ch 2, join to 1st ch 3. One should have 14 groups, 2 doubles each with chains between, ch 12.

4th round—4 s c under each ch 1 s c between 2 d c, 4 s c under next ch, repeat around, ch 12.



5th round—1 d tr c in s c between doubles, ch 6, 1 d tr c in next s c between double, finishing with ch 6, join to 1st ch 12. In this round one should have 14 sps, as shown in illustration.

6th round—10 s c under each ch 6.

7th, 8th and 9th rounds—1 s c in each s c, increasing by working 2 s c in one as is necessary to keep work flat. After completing 9th round ch 5.

10th round—1 d c in 2nd s c, ch 1, sk 1, 1 d c in next s c, repeat around, join last ch 1 to ch 5, ch 3.

11th round—1 d c, ch 1, 2 d c in this 1st sp, ch 5, sk 2 sps in 3rd sp, work 2 d c, ch 2, 2 d c, ch 5, 1 sh in next 3rd sp. Repeat around, finishing with ch 5, join to 1st sh. sl st to ch 1, ch 3.

CROCHETED WHEELS.

12th round—1 d c, ch 1, 2 d c under ch 1 in 1st sh, ch 2, 1 d c under ch 5, ch 2, sh on sh, repeat.

13th and 14th rounds—Same as the 12th.

15th round—Ch 3, form picot over 1st sh, 3 s c under ch 1, 1 p, 3 s c, 1 p, 6 s c under ch between shs, repeat over each sh.

Small Wheel

Ch 7, join in ring, ch 3, 1 d c in ring, ch 1, 2 d c, ch 5, 2 d c, ch 1, 2 d c, ch 5, repeat twice more, join, sl st to 1st ch 1.

2nd row—Ch 3, 1 d c, ch 1, 2 d c, ch 3, 1 s c under ch 5, ch 3, 1 s c, 3 more shs.

Follow with two more rows of shells, increasing the chains between so work will lie flat. Finish with singles and picots as in large wheel.

Simple Insertion

Ch 22 sts, turn.

1st row—1 d c in 9th st from hook, ch 2, sk 2, 1 d c, 1 tr c (thread over twice) in 4th st from hook, ch 5, 1 d c in 3rd st from treble, ch 2, 1 d c in last st, ch 5, turn.

2nd row—1 d c on d c, forming sp, ch 2, 1 d c under ch 5, 1 tr c on d c before treble in 1st row, ch 5, 1 sp, ch 6, turn.

Repeat. Each row has 2 sps, 1 treble on bias, 2 sps.

Two Circular Edgings

These two patterns are very similar, the first being a single block edge and the second a double block. Either can be made in the length or the first row of spaces may be worked directly into the edge of a linen circle.

To make separately the first row can be made as follows and joined: Ch 7, 1 d c in 1st ch, ch 5, 1 d c under ch, ch 5, 1 d c under ch, repeat, turning work under each ch.

CIRCULAR EDGING. SINGLE BLOCK.

2nd row—After a d c, ch 7, 1 d c in 3rd ch from hook, 4 more d c on ch, 1 d tr c (thread over 3 times) in 3rd sp, ch 3, * 5 d c under d tr, 1 d tr c in 5th sp, ch 3, repeat from *.

3rd row—For the double block, after completing second row, turn after a treble, ch 4, 1 s c under ch at beginning of last block, ch 7, 5 d c on ch, 1 d tr c under ch at beginning of second block in last row, ch 3, 5 d c under treble. Repeat.

4th row.—1 s c on end first block, ch 1, 1 d tr c under ch at end of second block, ch 1, 1 d tr c, repeat, making 5 trebles in all, ch 2, 1 s c on third block, 1 shell on end of fourth block. Repeat.

CIRCULAR EDGING. DOUBLE BLOCK.

5th row—1 d c on s c on first block, ch 2, 1 d c under ch, repeat making 6 sps over shell, repeat.

6th row—1 d c in first sp, ch 5, 1 d c in top of first d c, 1 d c in first sp. Repeat in each space.

For the narrower edge add the shells to the first row of blocks. J. C. CROCKER.

Filet Beading

This simple pattern is one which can be very rapidly made of cotton suitable for material with which the beading is to be combined.

Begin with a ch 21 sts, turn.

1st row.—5 sps, ch 5, turn.

2nd row—The same.

3rd row—1 sp, ch 9, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

4th row—5 sps, ch 5, turn.

5th row—2 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps.

6th row—3 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp.

7th row—2 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps.

8th row—5 sps.

9th row—1 sp, ch 9, 1 sp.

10th and 11th rows—Same as 1st and 2nd rows.

Repeat pattern from 3rd row.

Bags of Homespun in Oriental Darning

Bags and Baskets for Summer Use

BAGS and baskets, both large and small, of darned homespuns, coarse art cloths, soft woolens decorated with brilliants, knitted flowers, crocheted and knitted handbags and baskets in all sizes and shapes, are shown in endless array again this season and if possible are more attractive than ever.

Homespun Bags

In popularity homespun holds first place at present for sizable bags. These are usually square or oblong in shape and have darned-in designs or decorated bands of Oriental darning of colored wools.

The bag illustrated below has a darned-in design of the old homestead which is most fascinating. This model was of pink homespun 12x25 inches, doubled with seams up either side. Two and one-half inches from both top and bottom run in first a black then a white line, using Germantown or yarn of about a similar weight. Thread a small darner with the black and starting at the edge pass needle under two threads over four, and repeat. Next use the white passing over first three threads under two, over four, and repeat.

The base line of the little house and barn should be in the center of the bag. The color scheme in the bag shown includes black, white, gray, red and two shades of green. After marking the center line, start just below this and run in six strands of white, darning closely together and over five threads, under one, having the long stitches alternate as shown. Below this band, using gray, work over five, under three, over nine, under three, repeat. Run in three strands close together, finish by blocking in each group of gray with short black stitches taken at right angles.

Next block in the group of buildings with black zephyr, using this also for marking door and windows.

Darn up and down with short stitches, using gray for sides and for end of barn, and across with stitches a trifle longer, with white for the roofs. Barn door and chimney red, smoke, gray.

Either side of building run in groups of gray as below, then finish by placing a few trees and shrubs as shown, worked quite solidly with two or more shades of green.

Make flat-lined or rope-covered handles, finishing these and also the top of the bag which should be completely lined with sateen, with black and white buttonholing.

An Arm Bag

This model is not new, but is a favorite as it is of such convenient shape.

A bag of this sort can be made of size desired and of any woolen material, unlined if heavy enough to be serviceable. Odds and ends of wool can be worked up for the attractive loop roses which are made as follows:

Loop Rose—Ch 5, join 1 s c in ring. Wind wool around forefinger, as shown, seven or more times, push hook under loops on finger and draw loops through s c on ring, this completes 1 petal. Make five or more for each rose.

If one has small bits only of various colors knot together before working into loops, then when finished cut all knots which show, this will result in variegated chrysanthemum-like flowers which are very attractive.

Suggested attractive color combinations for rose.—One group yellow loops, balance light and dark old rose.

One yellow, balance black and henna wound together.

One yellow, balance tan and old blue.

Asters may be made with one yellow group and balance of shades of lavender and purple.

Sew rose in place and back with few lazy-daisy stitches of green.

Black, green or any dark shade may be used for finishing the bag with buttonholing.

Decorations in Oriental Darning

Darned bags are especially attractive.

Bands of gay colored wools of various designs can easily be worked into any material of square woven mesh. This work is very simple and much more rapid than when similar patterns are darned into linens, as the materials are so coarse.

Gray art or Monk's cloth was used in the bag illustrated, the darning being of gray wool or one same shade and a soft old pink.

For the band of work in this bag draw threads from a three-inch space. Allow two threads to form a unit. Starting with the gray wool weave over and under six units eight times, then dropping one on either side weave eight times on four, then same number on only two, carry wool to opposite edge and starting with one thread of the last unit and the next to form a new unit weave under and over six units eight times, then on four and on two as before. One will now have one point from each side completed. Run back to first side and make the third point and continue this way across the space. When these points are completed two threads or one unit will remain between each point. With the pink wool darn on the threads of first unit eight times, then on one of these threads and one thread from first point eight times, opposite the four units, then eight times two units, eight times below two units, eight times over two threads on opposite of space from starting. Work up second side of first in this way forming units from first and second points as shown.

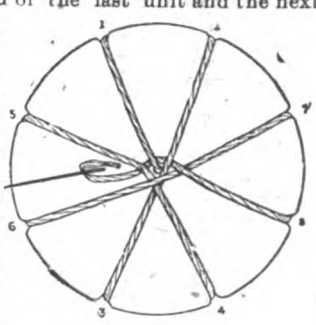

FIG. 1.

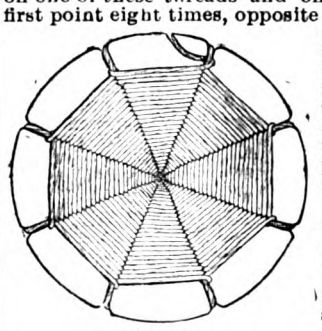

FIG. 3.

The weaving is so extremely simple even a beginner should have no difficulty in copying the pattern from the illustration.

For the bag a strip of material 12x30 inches will be required. Work the bands for both sides before making up the bag.

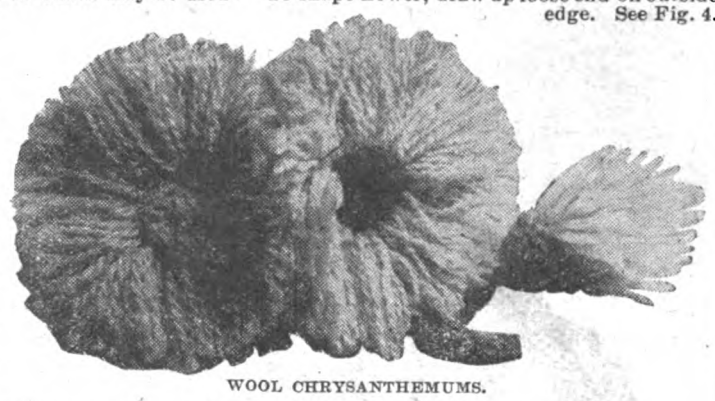
New Wool Flowers

Wool flowers, especially roses, have been used freely for several seasons. Such decorations are so appropriate for sport hats and bags of various sorts, that this season a decoration no less simple has sprung into instant favor.

A box of odds and ends of colored yarn, left from the thousand and one things you have knitted and crocheted in bygone days, will prove to be a veritable treasure box now in making these simple disc flowers.

They are fashioned so easily the only wonder is, it will seem to you, that you hadn't thought of it yourself.

For material one may use wools, chenille, rope silk or baby ribbon, and an ordinary coarse needle with a dull point if possible.



After making your disc, thread your needle and pass material through the hole in the center, leaving an end about three inches long. See Fig. 2. A pin point may be shoved through from which this end can be secured or it can easily be held in place.

Now, starting from the center on the front of the disc, pass from notch No. 1 across back to No. 2, across front to No. 3, on back to No. 4, on front to center, where you pass needle under No. 2, No. 1 and No. 5 and draw tightly. See Fig 1.

Keep working round and round, passing needle under each strand backwards, drawing up closely each time, as a loosely worked flower is not nearly as shapely when taken off the form.

When the material is used or the disc filled (see Fig. 3), take work off by slipping strands over the notches.

To shape flower, draw up loose end on outside edge. See Fig. 4.

WOOL CHRYSANTHEMUMS.

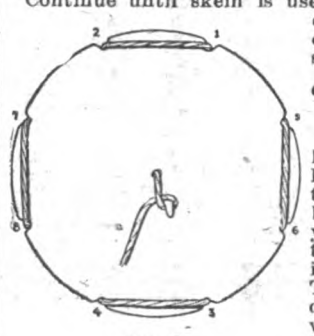
How to Make the Flowers

Daisies

Three yards yellow rope silk, one skein white rope silk. Use yellow for center in regular way, working under each strand backwards.

Tie on white and reverse stitch going around under two strands forward, and going completely around last strand.

Continue until skein is used up. Take off disc, form, tying outside to center strand.



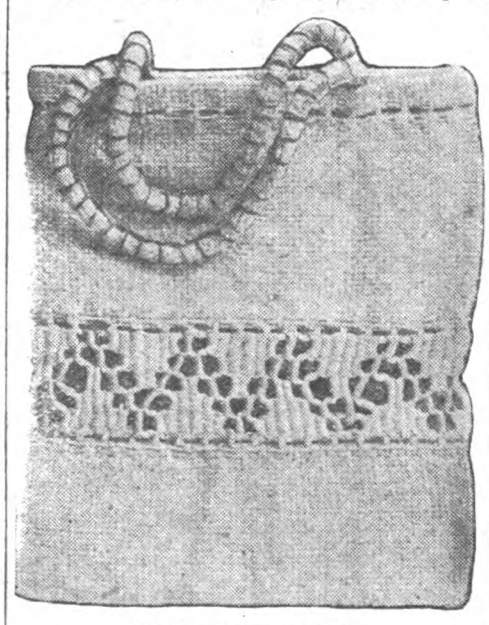


FIG. 2.

Chrysanthemums

One and one-half yards yellow yarn for center, white for balance. Use yellow for centers, working up in usual way. Take off and draw up. Wind white across center of disc, round and round 45 times. Slip off, tie in center, cut both ends. Sew yellow to center.

Buds

Wind white around 10 times, slip off, tie in center, cut ends, fold together. Make cup of green, as directed for Thistle. See illustration of spray.

BAG OF MONK'S CLOTH.

For sport hats these flowers make a most attractive trimming.

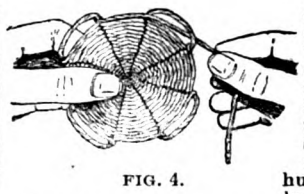

FIG. 4.

Corsage bouquets for organdie dresses are very pretty made up of rope silk; the flowers should be small and of many hues, backed by loops and long streamers of narrow satin ribbon.

Groups of small wool flowers are worn on sweaters and summer furs.

Baskets are now almost invariably decorated in some way with wools, a new and very easy and effective way being illustrated in the next column. Here long stitches of two shades of green are taken from the bottom upwards at different angles. Over these a spray of morning glories is arranged.

These may be the disc flowers or crocheted as one prefers. To crochet make a ring of 3 sts, ch 2, 7 d c in ring, join, ch 3, 7 d c on d c, ch 2, 1 d c on first st, 2 d c on second, repeat, join, ch 2, 2 d c on each d c. Make one or two more rounds increasing enough to give a good flare.

Poppies such as are shown on the jute bag are very pretty massed quite thickly on a basket at the top of the long green stitches.

These should be of the various poppy shades with gold center.

Tiny crocheted cups may be arranged closely on either side of a stock to represend hollyhocks.

JUTE BAG.

Many different flowers, such as morning glories, jonquils, cosmos, thistles, dahlia, daisies and chrysanthemums can be made.

All that is necessary for any type of flower is a small circle of stiff cardboard, notches at eight points on the edge and with a hole in the center. This should measure about three and one-half inches in diameter.

Morning Glory—Materials. Two yards white wool, three yards, pink, blue or lavender. Use white yarn for center, tie in other color with square knot and work. Take off as usual, finish center with yellow French knots. Form flower, wind stem with green wool.

Jonquils—Materials. One and one-half yards yellow wool, four yards white. Use yellow for center, working as usual. Tie in white wool and reverse stitch, going under two strands forward. Go completely around last strand. This will throw vein to top.

Thistles—Wind lavender wool, Shetland floss if possible, across center of disc about 50 times, cut one end, slip off, bring ends even, tie about in the center.

Cap—Use three yards green yarn on disc in usual way working under each strand backwards. Take off, form into cap, slip head of tassel into this, draw up closely and sew tightly. Finish stems with green.

Dahlias—Yellow center, white outside, brown center, yellow outside, yellow center, garnet outside. Other combinations will suggest themselves.

Outside—Wind wool across center of disc 45 times, slip off, cut both ends, tie in center.

Center—Use two yards of wool on disc in regular way, slip, form and sew to center of outside.

Infant's Tatted Cap

Use No. 30 or 40 cotton, the finer making a size about right for three to six months old baby, the coarser from six months to one year old.

Work is begun in the center of the crown with a ring of 14 picots with 1 d s between, close and tie thread securely and cut.

2nd round—1 small ring 3 d s, 1 p, joined top of center ring, leave one-fourth inch thread, 1 large ring, 4 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 1 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, close. Leave one-fourth inch thread and make 1 small ring, joining to 2nd p of center ring. Repeat these two rings. Join securely, tie and cut thread.

3rd round—1 large ring, one-fourth inch thread, 1 small ring, join to 1st p of large ring in last round, 1 large ring, join to 3rd p of 1st large ring in this round, 1 small ring, join to 3rd p of large ring in last row, 1 large ring, join to last large ring. Repeat, joining 2 small to each large ring in last round.

4th round—Same as last round.

This should give one a center of about five inches in diameter if the proper spacing has been left between the rings.

5th round—1 ring, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, close. Join center of this ring to center p of large ring in last round. Leave one-fourth inch space, 1 ring same as last, join 3rd ring to 1st ring by side p and to 2nd last ring in last round by center p, join 4th ring to 2nd ring. Repeat around excepting across about two inches which should be left for the back of the neck.

First row of front—1 small ring of 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 large ring joining center p to corresponding p of large ring in last round, 1 ring in opposite direction of 5 d s, join to p of small ring, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 5 d s, close. 1 large ring joined to 1st ring and to last round, as directed before.

2nd row—Same as last row but just the reverse, joining large rings to large rings.

3rd row—Same as 5th round.

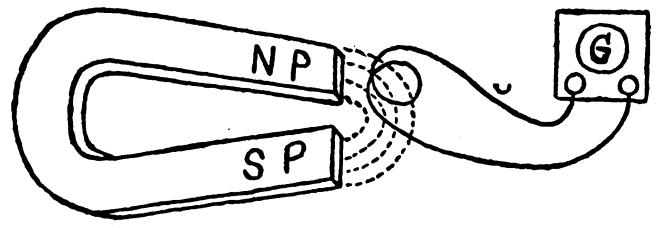
4th row—Same as 1st row of front.

The neck can be finished with one row of rings and the front run with ribbon, finished with rosettes at the sides and a bow on top.

Tatted Towel Insertion

This is a very effective pattern for any purpose where coarser work is preferable.

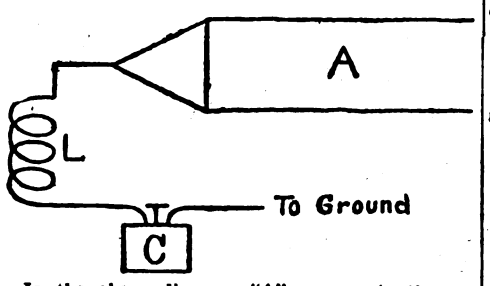
One large ring, 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, 1 p, one-fourth inch thread, 1 small ring, 6 d s, 1 p, 6 d s, 1 large ring, joined to side picot of large ring, 1 small ring joined to small ring, 1 large ring joined to side p of last large ring, 1 small ring. 1 large ring, 1 small ring joined to last small ring. Repeat pattern. Make a second length in the same way, joining the two small rings to the two small rings of the row just completed. When done this gives a dainty insertion for the needed guest towel.



The Fundamental Principles of Radiophone Receiver

IN the preceding issue we considered only the transmitting end of the radiophone. We shall now take up the radio receiver in detail, and it is the receiver that is of greatest interest to the public at this time. No license is necessary to install a radio receiver in the home and thousands of homes throughout the entire country are now equipped with receivers with which music, lectures, weather reports and various other forms of amusement and information are received daily. The rural districts are especially benefited by these daily broadcasting programs and it is now possible for every home, no matter how remote from the large cities, to keep in constant touch with the outside world. Receiving sets vary in elaborateness and cost according to the distance they are designed to cover (the distance between the sending station to the receiver); however, there are new stations being opened throughout the country and it will be only a short time before the whole country will have radio service which can be intercepted with sets of very low cost.

We have learned that the transmission waves are sent out from the sending station which travel in ever-widening circles, similar to the waves created by a pebble dropped into a pool of still water. These waves, as stated in the preceding article, are electro-magnetic, and we are now concerned with the means of intercepting and transforming them into sound waves, which is the function of the receiving set.



One of the most important facts of electrical science is that a magnetic field insected by an electrical conductor induces an electrical force in that conductor.

As an example of this activity let us consider poles of a horseshoe magnet. We all know that a piece of iron or steel brought near to the poles of such a magnet will be drawn to it. This proves that there is a magnetic field existing about the end of each pole. If we pass either pole close to a piece of copper wire, which is an electrical conductor, there will be an electrical current set up in the wire. If we connect the ends of the wire to a galvanometer we shall see that there will be a slight deflection of the needle, proving that an electrical current does exist when we pass the wire through the magnetic field. In the sketch below, the poles of the magnet are marked "N P" and "S P," respectively, the wire conductor "C" and the galvanometer "G."

We will now try applying this experiment to the radio wave. We will consider the wave as the magnetic field, the aerial as the conductor, and as the wave passes across the aerial an electrical current is set up in the aerial wire. These waves travel in every direction at a speed of one hundred eighty-six thousand miles per second, and the distance they will reach depends on the force by which they are sent out from the transmitting station, and may be intercepted by every conductor or aerial within their range of action. As the waves travel in all directions it is easily seen that if a station has a transmitting range of one hundred miles, it will be heard a hundred miles north, and also a hundred miles east, south and west, anywhere within a hundred miles.

It would seem from the foregoing that every aerial would intercept the waves from any transmitting station which had sufficient force or power to reach the receiving aerial. That is not true, however, for we have a very important fact to take into consideration, which is that a receiving aerial must be of the same electrical length as the transmitting aerial in order for the former to receive a transfer of energy. The two stations must be in resonance, and it is the receiving station which does the tuning. We must therefore have some means of varying the electrical length of the aerial. This is done in two different ways. A coil of wire is placed in series with the receiving aerial wire and by adding turns or taking out turns from this coil is one method of varying the electrical length. The common word for electrical length is "wave length," and we will use this term from now on. Another method of varying the wave length of the receiver is by placing a variable condenser either in series with the receiving aerial or across the coil we have in series, so that by varying the value of this condenser we vary the wave length of the receiver, and with the condenser we get much finer adjustment.

In the above diagram "A" represents the receiving aerial, "L" the coil or inductance, and "C" the condenser or capacity. It is not necessary to have the condenser but it gives the circuit a greater selectivity.

We are now at the most important step in radio receiving. It is possible to tune our receiver to the wave length of the transmitting station, and the little impulses are caught on our aerial.

Next we have to consider some means of making these impulses audible to the human ear. As they come into our receiving set they are in the form of radio-frequency alternating current. Taking away the technical phrasing, they are vibrating at a speed of over twenty thousand times per second. The human ear is capable of responding to vibrations of ten or fifteen thousands per second but not twenty or over. Therefore the radio-frequency currents have no effect upon the ears. We must therefore contrive some means of bringing these impulses down to audio frequency. This is done with what is known as a detector. Perhaps a more simple name for this instrument would be a rectifier. It acts as a rectifier to these radio frequency currents and after passing through this detector the current is in the form of direct pulsating current. The most common method of detecting is by means of a crystal having the property of allowing an electric current to pass through it in one direction only. There are many such crystals, the most popular being galena. Not only does this rectify our current but it also cuts the frequency in half so that when transformed into sound waves these become audible to the human ear. There are other methods of detecting these currents and the audion tube is, undoubtedly, the most efficient of all. The action of the audion tube is very complex and will be explained and described in a later article.

After rectifying our incoming alternating current to direct current it is a simple matter to transform these direct impulses to sound waves. For this purpose the regular telephone receiver may be used, but as these give a very weak sound we generally employ a more sensitive receiver such as are sold for this purpose by all radio dealers and are especially adapted for radio reception.

Summing up the radio receiver we find that it is necessary in order to receive radio messages to have a tuner, a detector, and a telephone receiver. With the exception of the telephone receiver and the crystal, the entire receiving outfit can be made at home and thousands of men and boys are now making their own sets.

Questions relating to the radiophone, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Radio Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department.

Questions and Answers

Q.—Where can I obtain a list of the broadcasting stations which will be up to date? J. S., N. Dak.

A.—A copy of such a list may be obtained from the Boston Herald or any radio dealer will furnish you with a copy.

Q.—I hear Pittsburg and Newark very clearly but I have not been able to hear Springfield although I am much nearer that station. I want to know if my set is at fault or what is the cause?

F. L. D., Houlton, Maine.

A.—That is a rather difficult question to answer. However, several receiving stations have reported the Springfield station as very weak up in the northern part of Maine.

Q.—What is the cost of a good crystal set? F. B., S. C.

A.—You should be able to procure a good crystal set for approximately twenty-five dollars. This set would be capable of receiving music for a distance of from fifteen to twenty-five miles.

Q.—Who is station K.D.O.W. and what is his wave length?

G. S. T., N. J.

A.—K.D.O.W. is the S. S. America and his wave length is 425 meters.

Q.—What is the approximate cost of a radiophone transmitter which will send twenty miles? M. R. D., Ohio.

A.—The approximate cost of such an instrument would be about seventy dollars. A catalogue will be forwarded to you by a reliable dealer in a few days.

Q. What is a Baldwin unit, and what is the price of this unit? B. J. W., Ill.

A.—A Baldwin unit is simply one of the ear pieces of a pair of Baldwin phones and they are used for loud speakers owing to their being a very sturdy built phone. They sell for six dollars and any radio dealer will be able to supply you.

Q.—Will two wires in my receiving antenna give twice as good results as one? R. W. B., Tenn.

A.—No. One wire is as good as two far receiving. For transmitting, two wires would give better results but not twice as good.

Q.—What are some good crystals for radio receivers? T. M., Ark.

A.—Galena is the most sensitive crystal. Some others are carborundum, perikon, zincite and silicon.

Q.—Which is more sensitive, a crystal or a detector tube? L. P., Ind.

A.—A good detector tube is far more sensitive than a crystal; however, there are some tubes that are no more sensitive than a good crystal.

Comfort's League of Cousins

they did act fresh. I wonder where she gets her logic!

Now for my wandering which so many have asked about, and why. The reason for it can be explained in three words: Unsatisfactory home conditions. My wandering was confined to my native state. Many will think it wasn't much wandering, but if you stop to consider that I had to work my way, you won't wonder that I did not get out of my state. I covered quite a territory as it was, working at every place I stopped: munition plants, steel works, furniture factories, hotels, farms, etc. Inexperienced as I was, I all the time got a better idea of the ways of the world. Besides I gained considerable knowledge of how things are made that are used in everyday life. Three times I tried to enlist in the service of my country, in three different branches of the service: the Marines, Cavalry and Infantry, but I was rejected every time. Even today the call of the wanderlust is in my ears. Some day I must answer it. Then I want to get clear out of my state the first jump. I have been thinking seriously of trying to enlist in the Marines again. It affords travel and valuable training. But my letter is getting long—too long, I fear. So I will close. Thanking everyone for your attention and your letters, I am

A loyal nephew and cousin,
AUGUSTUS H. TRICK.

P. S. I would be pleased to hear from Ruth.

Gus, whether the feminine members of our Happy Bunch smile or frown, it is certain that they have to sit up and take notice when you arrive and commence exploding verbal bombs among the equipment of bureau and dressing-table.

I'm with you, Gus, in abolishing style if it makes girls smoke, but it is not style so much as their own unreasoning little blonde and brunette heads. And mind you, this point of style in smoking applies to boys, too, Augustus, as your quick-thinking head will probably tell you. A boy smokes first, not because he likes it or that there is something inherently attractive in a roll of tobacco, but because he thinks it's the thing for a man to do. He has seen older boys smoke and he starts a little first unhappy experimenting on the sly. Many boys never smoke until they leave home for boarding school or college where they find the practice so universal that they join in the general custom—of style.

You say "one miss leads to many," Gus. But I think this really depends upon the miss. Sometimes a boy gets hooked up with the first miss he keeps company with and he never progresses any further. But of course I don't know what your experience has been among Pennsylvania girls or how you have been lead in your wandering years, Gus, when you came to form your strong opinions and tastes concerning lip sticks.

Be sure and write us when the time comes that you take your first big jump out of William Penn's territory. I shall think of you as collecting powder puffs as the Huron used to gather scalps, and perhaps it would be a good trick for you to found a branch of the Augustus Anti-Cosmetic League in each state that you jump through.

But, seriously, Gus, I'm with you in every word of this last letter of yours. More power to you and your plain speaking wherever truth—and beauty—are obscured by clouds of talcum and layers of rosy pigment.

JEWETT, N. Y.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I hope you will admit me to your happy circle of cousins. I live in the Catskill mountain region. There is certainly some beautiful scenery in the Catskills and they are very famous as a summer resort. My father owns a large farm and boarding house here. We keep about forty head of cattle, some sheep, four horses, and of course we could not get along without the "farmers' carryall," the Ford car.

As all the cousins describe themselves, I shall do likewise: I am seventeen years old, five feet, four inches tall, and weigh 117 pounds. My hair is medium brown in color. My parents had seven children—three of them having blue eyes, three of them having gray eyes, and I, being the youngest, have a blue and a gray. My father has blue eyes, while my mother's are gray.

I am a senior in high school and like my studies very much. I am taking a four-year course in three years. My favorite studies are French, geometry and algebra. I am also fond of music, but I can cook, too, and even milk a few cows if necessary.

I do not believe that an education need spoil a girl. I think she can receive a good education and yet be a good housekeeper. I agree with Ruskin in his "Sesame and Lilies," "A girl's education should be as thorough as a boy's."

I am not a believer in the use of cosmetics—good pure air and good health are the best artists to paint a girl's face. It will probably shock some of the cousins to hear that I do not own such an article as a powder puff—and I am happy without it.

"Hopeless Joan of Alabama:" I liked your letter very much. I think that in nearly every small town people try to make your own business theirs and neglect their own.

I would like to hear from some of the cousins and will try to answer all letters received.

Your new niece and cousin,
GRACE SWEET.

Grace, I could surprise you if I told you how well I happen to know your beautiful Catskill hill country. For instance, I have many times motored up the long grade that takes one from the Windham-Ashland road up to Jewett Heights and George Chase's big white boarding house. I don't know just where you live with those G. A. R. eyes and those forty head of cattle, but the next time I am in Peck's store, or happen to see my friend, Mr. Lockwood, I am going to ask him if he knows a girl who reads Ruskin and who has one blue and one gray optic. I am firmly convinced, Grace, that your part of the country is unbeatable for health, beauty and coolness as a summer resort. And the absence of the much-cursed and always increasing mosquito should alone make the section famously popular. To my notion it is the combination of mountains with a fine dairy country and splendid intervale farms which makes the Windham Valley and vicinity so attractive. It is a happy cow that with thirty or forty companions can munchingly mount higher and higher in the airy upland pastures, drinking now and then at the various cool springs which gush from the different levels of the mountainside. Grace, in my next incarnation I think it would be great to be a Jersey yearling on a Pleasant Valley farm. I am going to ask a Theosophist friend of mine how this can be arranged.

Ruskin is a good teacher, Grace. You may be sure he would have loved your unstained countryside. Get all the education you can without sacrificing health or happiness. Some people might not think a knowledge of French, music and algebra would help in keeping house, but the fact is they help in many things. A well-trained, well-filled mind can accomplish any task better for being so trained and equipped. Cooking, for instance, is really an art, as well as a series of chemical experiments.

Grace, if you want to know what one fine appreciator thinks of the country where you live, read "The Catskills," by T. Morris Longstreth. And don't forget to bow if you see me in Peck's store some day, for I am bashful and need encouragement when meeting blue-gray eyed strangers. You will be able to recognize me by my gray mustache and the fact that I am leading a fat Goat by a two-inch rope.

GRANT'S PASS, BOX 147, OREGON.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I was just reading COMFORT'S League of Cousins in your wonderful paper and I thought I would let you know that I lived way out West among the "sticks." I guess I had better introduce myself: I am a young ambitious fellow, twenty-one years of age, with black hair and brown eyes. I am five feet, ten inches tall, and weigh 160 pounds.

It is a wonderful life to live out here amid Nature, but I have a longing, like most boys have, to go out and see the world. Really, to tell the truth, I guess I am lonesome.

I imagine you would like to know about this part of the country. We have many mountains and dense forests and wild country. There are lots of hunting, fishing and out-of-door sports, with the finest climate any one could wish for. We have a large electric sign across the Main Street in Grant's Pass which reads: "It's the Climate." The Rogue River runs through the lower part of town, which gives us a bathing and boating resort in the summer, also good fishing. But the paradise of a resort is Crater Lake near here. This has bathing, boating and fishing the best ever. And it has the most beautiful sunsets of all colors. I am a lover of Nature and I enjoy it so much. Thousands of tourists visit Crater Lake each year.

I hope Billy the Goat doesn't chew this up, for I am a very lonesome single young fellow and I wish all the cousins to write to me. Please tell them all that I am lonesome. I will answer all.

Lovingly your nephew, LEON GARNER.

Leon, even if you are as ambitious as you say you are, you will need every ounce of this ambition stuff to answer all the letters you will be getting from members of our Big Family who will be glad to cheer your lonesomeness out there amid the big sticks. Why even I almost wept as I read your sad letter. I thought of you as sitting alone by the edge of Crater Lake, gazing forlornly at the many-colored sunset, and with a pile of railroad folders beside you in which you had been seeking routes to "go out and see the world." As you truly say, Leon, old boy, a desire for wandering is a natural one with youth, but this old world sometimes fails to do its part in showing up anything as good as that left behind. I am going to quote you, from memory, what a Western poet once said about just this thing—maybe he had done some wandering himself before he wrote it!

"We live, most of us, in belief
That if we were possessed of wings
We'd fly away from toil and grief,
And all that work and worry brings;
But if we were and if we flew
To those far fields, no doubt we'd find
More worry than we ever knew,
More trouble than we left behind."

Think this over, Leon, before you buy your ticket away from that electric sign and "the finest climate any one could wish for." But if you do wander a bit, Crater Lake and its sunsets will be always there, always beautiful, and always serenely ready to welcome you back. But probably you will have to stay at home for a while and answer letters.

ATLANTA, 29 South Humphries Street, GEORGIA.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

Won't you please pardon my intrusion and have my cousins move over a bit so as to let me in the big, wonderful and happy bunch? Thank you. This is my first letter and I hope Billy doesn't get a taste of it. Uncle, have you ever visited Atlanta? Of course you have; and really don't you think it is the most convenient place in the world for fresh white gloves? I do.

Atlanta, the "Gate City" of the South, is one of the few cities not located upon a water route. Northeast of it, for over three hundred and fifty miles, there is no easy pass across the mountains, and until [illegible] no railroads crossed the Appalachians. Near Atlanta there is a good route, and railways reaching westward from the Carolinas come together, making Atlanta a great railway center. It is also the leading market of the South and one of the most progressive cities in the country. After reading all about Atlanta, Uncle, I guess you and the cousins wouldn't mind knowing what I'm like: I'm a little girl of seventeen, weighing 103 pounds; height, five feet, three inches. I have real fair complexion, golden blonde hair, gray-blue eyes and clear-cut features.

I don't agree exactly with Augustus Trick on the powder puff question, 'cause I uses powder and other beauty cosmetics. I really think every girl has the privilege to try and better her appearance, but I think, of course, every one can go to extremes.

Perhaps I have said enough. Love to all the cousins.

Truly your niece, [illegible]

The time I visited Atlanta, Roberta, I was not wearing any white gloves—either fresh, salted or sugar-cured. All I had on my paws was a coat of Tennessee tan and a little coal dust from the L. & N. railroad, so I can't tell you whether or not I found it inconvenient to assume white gloves within the confines of the Gate City of the South. The best sort of gloves to not show soil, Roberta, are those made of a medium-weight gumbo skin, with three buttons of engraved galena. Get a pair of these and you can walk down Peachtree street in full confidence that you are suitably attired.

I am glad to agree with you, Roberta, that Atlanta is a progressive city. It is full of pep, coco-cola, and all sorts of effervescent things. I remember well how, on warm evenings, I used to stroll down and listen to the band concerts at the Clark Theological School. If it were not for this trouble about white gloves, Atlanta would be an ideal place for any girl to live who had golden blonde hair and clear-cut features. Roberta, after reading your description, I don't see why in the world you should need a powder puff to "better your appearance." Why not keep the powder to restore the whiteness of those difficult gloves and let your nose remain pink, tip-tilted and charmingly sunburned?

EMMETT, R. R. 2, BOX 24, TENNESSEE.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA AND COUSINS:

I am sending in my renewal to COMFORT today, so I just thought I would steal the extra five cents and become a member of your great League. I know I am going to be very proud to be a member. I have taken COMFORT several years and was very fond of Uncle Charlie and I don't think he could have picked out a better successor than our Uncle Lisha.

I have never seen a letter from this part of Tennessee. I do not suppose many of you have ever heard of Emmett, but it is not the real name of this place—it is only the name of our post office. The real name of this place is Holston Valley. It is situated on the Holston River. Farming is our chief industry. The scenery is very beautiful and is attracting tourists since a road has been completed across the Holston Mountains. The nearest city is Bristol which is eleven miles away. I live on a farm and believe I like country life better than city life. I can't see why city folks think they are better than farmers when they depend upon the farmers for everything they eat. And who raises the sheep and cotton and silk worms on which they depend for clothing? Not the city folks! So I can't see why they think they are better than we are. Can you, Uncle Lisha?

Uncle, what have you to say against the women of today? Everyone has a slam to give them, so I just imagined you would be no exception. Do you think the men of today are any better than the women? I can't see any difference. Is it any worse for a woman to smoke cigarettes than it is for a man? Is it any worse for a woman to go car-riding unchaperoned than it is for the man to take her out unchaperoned? Is it any worse for a woman to attend indecent dances than it is for a man to take her there and dance with her? Is it any worse for a woman to dress in extreme styles than it is for the man to be attracted by the woman dressed in them? Is it fair to give all women a slam just because some are going to an extreme? I do not, and I know lots of girls who do not smoke, go to indecent dances, wear extreme styles and go car-riding and other places unchaperoned.

Well, as I like those letters best in which the writers describe themselves, I will give my description: I am about five feet tall, weigh 109 pounds and have light brown hair and blue eyes. My complexion is—well, I don't know what it is. I have never seen it with the tan off. I have a forgiving disposition and am never mad at any one long. So if you and the cousins do not give me too big a slam, I won't be mad at you more than one day and will forgive you and come again some day.

I would like to hear from any of the cousins about my own age—which is between sixteen and twenty. Can you guess my age, Uncle? I will answer all who send stamp.

Your new niece and cousin, MARTHA BUCKLES.

How do you know that city folks think "they are better than farmers," Martha? Take my word for it, there are loads of town dwellers who would give their eye-teeth to be able to lead a quiet and independent existence in the country. Why, Martha, when you talk with ninety-nine out of a hundred city folk you will find that they are holding as a cherished dream the day when they can give up their noisy, machine-like toil and own a little place of their own where green things grow in the sun. In the past twenty years the life of the farm has become pleasanter, broader and happier in many ways, while the pressure of city existence has increased in exactly the opposite directions. And those who live in the city understand this very well. In New York State in the past two years there has been a genuine boom in the selling of farms to city buyers. Instinctively the city dweller knows how abnormal is the life of towns, but most of the poor creatures are never able to get ahead enough financially to break their chains of unnatural living.

There are lots of bugs and worms raised in the city, Martha, but nevertheless you are right in saying that city folk never raise any sheep-worms, cotton-worms or silkworms. However, we raise plenty of subway-worms, landlord-worms and bad-air worms down here.

Certainly, Martha, if one believes that the women of today have degenerated, the holder of this opinion must logically attack the manners and modes of men, also. Of course, the truth is that the bad and good in both men and women are distributed pretty equally. There is good in the worst of us and bad in the best of us. Let us have patience one with another: boost all we can and slam only when a real jolt seems to be the only thing that can fill the bill—or fill Billy!

HAMPTON, R. R. 1, Box 26, ARKANSAS.

DEAR UNCLE LISHA:

I have thought many times of writing to COMFORT, but this is my first attempt although I have been a reader for several years. Before I go any further I will describe myself: I am five feet, two inches high and weigh 110 pounds. I was fourteen years old the 18th of February. I have gray eyes, auburn hair and a fair complexion. We live on a farm of 120 acres and have 72 acres in cultivation. It is my mother's old home and is considered a very pretty place. I have two brothers and two sisters; one brother and one sister are dead. I go to school at Locust Bayou, a village of about 75 inhibitions. We have a two-room school building. My brother and I go in the upper room and my sister goes in the lower room. She is only nine years old and in the fourth grade. Brother and I are in the seventh grade. I have only been to school about fifteen months in my life. I was taken with rheumatism when I was four years old and have suffered a great deal with it. There was one time when I could not move a finger or a toe and could not feed myself. There were five weeks last winter that I couldn't walk, but my health has been good for the last twelve months. I will tell you cousins what my mother did for me when I was so helpless: A friend of hers read in COMFORT of what a mother had done for her little boy, so my mother tried it on me. She rubbed me with olive oil for three hours every day. She kept this up almost four months and when she stopped rubbing me you couldn't tell I had ever had rheumatism. She has been up many nights with me trying to do something to ease me, and she has also taught me almost all I know. I am proud of my mother and love her very much. I certainly know how to sympathize with the sick and afflicted as I have

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

One Wire System

MY car left the factory equipped with the two wire system. Since the year in which my car was made the manufacturer has changed to the single wire system. Among the new features which I desired to incorporate on my model was a horn button operating from the top of the steering column. Unless I changed the construction of the button it was necessary to install a single wire system. About the same time a friend sent me a stop light having but a single contact so I decided that I would wire so as to have both single and two wire systems. I first visited an electric shop and purchased an old-type porcelain fuse holder. The heavy house fuse was easily removed and a five ampere one substituted. Next I screwed the fuse block to the side of the body sill and connected one side of the fuse by wire to the frame and the other side of the fuse to the negative terminal of the storage battery. Due to the possibility of corrosion by coupling to the battery direct, I used the two wire system for the return. There was a large cable running from the negative terminal of the battery to a post on the starting motor. By joining the cable from the fuse to the post on the starting motor it will be understood how I obtained a return to the battery for the single wire system. The reason for introducing this special fuse into the circuit is to afford protection for the battery and wiring should I obtain a short in the single wire system. Believing that some owners or garage men may at some time desire to install a single wire appliance into a double wire system, I am submitting the accompanying diagram which of course may be altered to meet the requirements of the individual case.

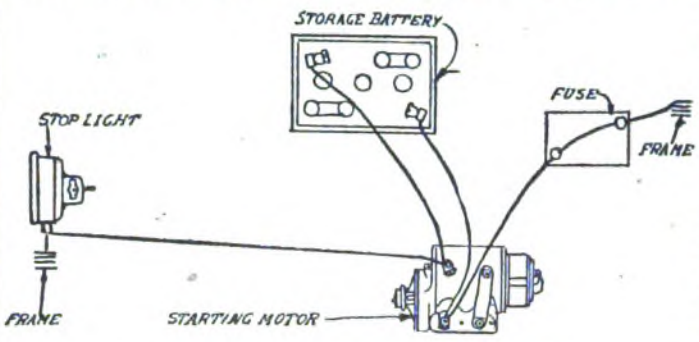

DIAGRAM ILLUSTRATING ONE-WIRE SYSTEM.

Charging Magneto by Dry Cells

This month again saw our mails flooded with inquiries regarding the charging magnets with dry cells. As stated in the last issue, I promised to get in touch with the person who passed the information on to me. Following are extracts from his letter:

"It is true that it is possible to recharge magnetoes on a Ford car with the use of five dry cells. However, the possibility of changing the polarity of this magneto, but not knowing which pole is up, I would advise anyone that is in doubt to obtain a compass and find the North pole of the magnet.

"My experience with these magnetoes is such that it leads me to believe that it would not make much difference on a magnet that was entirely demagnetized to start out.

"I got some information on the charging of these magnets from a manual back in 1906 when it was necessary for repair men to find out this data and do the work on the road rather than take it to a service station. It is a fact that this operation can be accomplished with a set of dry cells by grounding the negative side of the battery and using the positive side of the feeler by removing the little terminals over the flywheel whereby you can reach in and make contact with the magnets.

"It is only necessary to exhaust the set of cells into the magnets at intervals of about 10 seconds contact. My experience was that when the five cells were run down, the magnets were amply strong and would give the very best of satisfaction."

I might add that I have received a few letters from owners who have successfully charged the magnets by dry cells. The person who furnishes the above information is a very capable mechanic. He is at present manager of a large service station (factory branch). I personally have a great deal of confidence in his advice. Although I cannot vouch for this method of charging magnets, I would suggest that those who are skeptical try out the method as it is inexpensive and will at least prove interesting.

Helpful Pointers

Hot Toe Board

If the toe board of your car becomes too hot during the summer months purchase some asbestos sheeting and tack it to the under side of board. Also tilt the lower half of windshield in so as to direct a current of air around the feet.

Leather Upholstery

Do not wipe leather upholstery with gasolene as this treatment is injurious. Use a cloth dipped in water to which has been added a few drops of ammonia.

Care of Tubes

The sack in which the spare tube is carried should be liberally sprinkled with talc.

Tire Pump

Don't cuss the tire pump because it doesn't produce sufficient pressure. Probably the leather plunger is dry and requires a few drops of neat's-foot oil to soften it.

Spring Shackles

The grooves in a spring shackle bolt will sometimes become clogged with hard grease. Regardless of the pressure exerted, it will be impossible to force new grease into the bolt. A simple remedy for this condition is to heat a large nail and push it into the bolt. The heat will melt the hardened grease and by allowing the nail to remain in the bolt until cool it will heat the bolt sufficiently to soften any hard grease that might be clogging communicating grooves.

Spring Lubrication

It is the action which follows the sudden compression of a spring that causes breakage. The compression will not cause the spring to break. From observation it will be noted that the spring leaves slide over each other and for this reason lubrication should not be neglected. If the leaves are free to slide then the danger of breaking a spring from a rebound is considerably lessened. A mixture of cylinder oil and kerosene is very satisfactory for spring lubrication. If the weight of the car be removed by jacking, the kerosene and oil mixture will readily penetrate. Oil that has been drained out of the motor is also very satisfactory for this purpose. If it is not desired to jack the weight off the springs then it will be a good plan to squirt the mixture beween the leaves and rely upon the oscillating action to work the lubricant between the leaves.

Proper Oil

"Pour in a quart of oil." "Any special kind?" "No. Anything will do." This is just about the conversation that takes place between some motorists and the man at the filling station. Some of the men who have charge of the station have learned the proper grades of oil to use for different motors and when such is the case it is the owner's good fortune. However, if the man at the station should take the owner at his word and pour in the first grade of oil he should happen to lay his hands on, then it is the owner's misfortune. All motors do not take the same grade of oil. If such was the case there would be no need for the carrying of several grades. You do not want to use an oil that goes to pieces when subjected to intense heat and leaves your cylinder walls a prey to friction. Look through your instruction book for the manufacturer's recommendation regarding the proper oil to use for different seasons. If you do not find it there, write directly to the manufacturer and request a list of oils that are satisfactory for your make of motor.

Answers to Correspondents

HARD-STARTING ENGINE.—My 1918 model Maxwell car fails to start with the self-starter unless someone cranks the engine at the same time I put pressure on the starter. Can you tell me what the trouble is, and how to fix it? MRS. A. E. M., Buffalo, N. Y.

A.—I am of the opinion that there is a misalignment of the starting motor that is causing your trouble. If the Bendix drive is used then there might be a possibility that the shaft is out of alignment which would account for the heavy drag on the starting motor, causing it to stall. The teeth in the flywheel might also be clogged. I would suggest removal of the starting motor and a general checking of the shaft, etc.

ENGINE OVERHEATS AT HIGH SPEED.—I have a 1915 model Ford car. Please explain timing of the engine valves. Please define the Ford starting and lighting system. My car will not run over 18 miles an hour without overheating the engine and I get very loud muffler explosions. May it be due to wrong timing of valves? How should connecting-rod bearings be tightened? If pistons let too much oil through would oversize rings remedy this trouble? How should vibrator blades be adjusted for best results?

J. G. S., R. R. 1, Black, Mo.

A.—Providing you have not tampered with the timing gears, it is next to an impossibilty for the valve timing to change.

I do not quite understand what you expect when you ask me to define the starting and lighting system. It would require a volume of books to go into the matter thoroughly.

Regarding your car not gaining a speed in excess of 18 miles per hour, I would suggest that you try another carburetor adjustment. Possibly the mixture is much too rich, causing the motor to choke. This condition would also cause overheating. It might be well to examine the timer. It may be worn out and require replacing or it might be dirty and need cleaning.

The backfiring in the muffler is usually due to one or more cylinders missing, loading the muffler with gas which is set off by the next hot charge entering the muffler.

To adjust the connecting rods, take off the lower half of crank case. I have seen cars of your make that have shims between the cap and rod. For this arrangement the adjustment is made by removing one or more shims until a proper fit is obtained. I have also seen rods that do not have shims. When such is the case grind off a little of the cap.

A rough point or dirty contact will slow a vibrator, therefore, a clean and smooth contact is necessary. All vibrators must be tuned as nearly alike as possible to obtain the best results. Adjust the vibrator until they "sing" at a high pitch.

July in the Garden

SEASONS may vary from year to year but we have yet to experience a July without hot weather and hay-making. These two are as sure and dependable as taxes.

Nor is it unusual to find Dad and the boys show a marked inclination to linger in the cool and inviting shade of the big maple in the front yard on the rare occasions when there happens to be a lull in farm work—even when there is weeding and hoeing to be done in the garden. But think it over. Is it fair to leave such work to the "women folks"? Say, don't we men eat far more than our share of the creamed peas, buttered beets, fresh greens, tomatoes sliced or stewed, wax beans, string beans, salads and a variety of other "goodies" too numerous to mention? Gosh! Almost forgot to include sweet corn, piping hot and dripping butter. Why, it fairly makes one's mouth water just to mention it. Just keep all these things in mind, then help out a bit in the garden when there is work to be done. Remember that you will be repaid in full for your work three times a day at the table. Now, here are some of the things to be done.

How to Hoe Correctly

Weeds, like the poor, are always with us. They must be fought steadily. In younger growing crops the old-fashioned hoe and the hand cultivator are deadly enemies of weeds—if they are used effectively and frequently. Carry a small file and touch up the hoe occasionally; it is surprising how a good sharp edge will keep away backaches for the hoe wielder. In many localities, and in most all larger gardens, the hand cultivator has supplanted the hoe for keeping weeds in check and preserving the dust mulch between the rows. This handy implement saves time, does efficient work, and is less likely to do damage even if used a bit carelessly than is the hoe. A light hand cultivator is preferable to a heavy one; though the light one may not be so durable, a heavy hand cultivator soon tires the operator. The secret of correct hoeing, whether the common hoe or the hand cultivator be used, is to stir the soil thoroughly and leave the surface fine, loose and level. Many gardeners make the mistake of pulling a quantity of loosened soil on top of an undisturbed area, leaving part of the soil compact. In hoeing, stir the soil closest to you first, then instead of pulling the soil toward you three or four inches, as is commonly done, move it only very slightly. Remove the hoe by lifting it so that at the end of the completed operation the hoe is slightly farther away from you and in position for the next stroke. Thus the loosened soil is allowed to fall back into nearly its original position, making raking unnecessary.

About Sprinkling

The number of farms equipped with running water from pressure systems or tanks is rapidly increasing, and many gardens are no longer compelled to "go thirsty" during the midsummer drought. But watering the garden deserves a word of caution. When watering is done, do it thoroughly. Lightly sprinkling the surface does little good, but can do a great deal of harm by compacting the loosened surface, inducing evaporation and causing caking. For best results do not sprinkle the garden; give it a thorough soaking, moving the hose from place to place only when the soil is saturated six to eight inches deep. The best time to do this is in the evening, though early in the morning on cloudy days is allowable. Never make the mistake of turning a sprinkler on growing plants during the midday heat and sun. To do so causes wilting or blanching, for the tiny drops soon become hot enough to scald tender leaves. Even lawns should be watered morning or evening, and less water will be required.

Pull Large Weeds

Just a word about weeds. The small ones may be receiving their full share of attention, but there is a marked tendency to overlook the big, lusty fellows that show their heads in rows of potatoes and other crops that have been "laid by." Remember that from these weeds, so commonly allowed to thrive and make seed, comes the weed infestation of following years. Hand pulling is the only solution and it is a man's job, indeed, to uproot full-grown ragweed, sour dock, pig weed or several other uninvited garden guests. Don't leave this task to the "missus" and the girls; some night after chores are done go out and have a little surprise party all by your own. You'll find plenty to do among the potatoes, sweet corn, tomatoes, grape vines and berry bushes, or we miss our guess. Pile all your "pullin's" to one side where they will dry out, then burn them. If they are simply pulled and tossed in the rows many of them will still make seed "with their feet in the air."

Renewing Old Pastures

The first thing to do with old, worn-out, unprofitable pastures is to scarify or disk up the surface soil, since the chances are ten to one that they are "hidebound" from constant tramping, then seed down with a mixture of blue grass, red top and white clover. Use from 20 to 30 pounds of seed to the acre, depending on the amount of surface stirring you have done. A common mixture for this purpose consists of 30 pounds blue grass, 15 pounds red top, and six pounds white clover. Do not make the mistake of using too little seed. A pound or two of seed too much will do no harm, but a "stingy" seeding will give the weeds a chance to gain a foothold. In poor, weedy pastures this treatment is the only certain means of getting a good even stand of grass. Handled as described, old pastures can be cheaply and quickly renewed.

Sometimes it is unnecessary to scarify old pastures. They may have managed to maintain a firm sod and an even stand of grass somehow in spite of neglect. Where this is the case the manure spreader will perform wonders, if given a chance, but if manure is spread as a top dressing during summer it must be done when pastures are not needed for livestock. It has been found that when a top dressing of manure is applied to grass it will not only improve the stand and stimulate growth, but that the land shows the effect for two or three years afterwards. For this reason it is a paying proposition to top dress even temporary pastures that are to be plowed up later and put into crops.

In addition to barnyard manure, acid phosphate is becoming more popular for pasture renewing. Particularly in the East has this been practiced with good result, but recently striking examples of success have been reported in the Middle West following the application of 500 pounds of acid phosphate per acre. The benefits may not be noticeable the first year following its use, but the second season and following years show a marked improvement. Grass grows faster, stronger and closer together, and under test it has been noted that fertilized grass is preferred to unfertilized by livestock. Clover also shows great improvement, growing in much thicker and withstanding severe winters a great deal better. Weeds find it more difficult to compete with and crowd out fertilized grasses than the weak stands upon poor land.

Lime or ground limestone should be used where the land is acid. Perhaps the best indication of acidity is the failure of clover to thrive. Certain weeds such as sheep sorrel also make their appearance when soil becomes acid. Ground limestone should be used at the rate of one to two tons per acre depending upon the needs of the soil. Slaked lime spread at the rate of one-half a ton to the acre will suffice.

Cowpeas as a Pasture Crop

Good results are obtained by pasturing cowpeas with any kind of livestock, the most common practice, however, being to hog them down. Cowpeas are a good feed for young pigs, but some grain is also required for best results. Hogs will usually feed on the mature pods first, leaving the dried vines and leaves. For this reason it is often profitable to turn cattle or sheep onto fields where hogs have pastured for some time, as they will pasture off leaves and stems left by the hogs. Dairy cows show the effects of such pasturing by increased milk flow. Young lambs and wethers fatten well on cowpeas in corn fields, the mixture of cowpea seed and corn leaves making a fine ration.

At the Alabama Experiment Station it was found that pigs fed on corn alone gained 0.36 pound daily, while hogs on cowpea pasture and corn gained 0.97 pound daily, consuming 36 per cent. less corn for each pound gained. The same station conducted a feeding experiment with pasturage for dairy cows, using an upland cornfield from which the ears had been removed and in which cowpeas had been drilled between the rows. The field was first pastured by three milk cows and later by three dry cows, the milk cows in the meantime receiving three pounds of cottonseed meal daily. On the cowpea pasture the yield of milk was 15.8 per cent. greater and the yield of butter 9.5 per cent. higher than when the cows with the same grain feed ran on a good pasture of Bermuda grass, carpet grass, and lespedeza. In addition to the increase in milk and butter the cows gained a total of 85 pounds in weight during the 19 days, and the dry cows gained 53 pounds in nine days.

At the Arkansas Experiment Station steers fattened on cowpea pasture and cottonseed meal made an average gain of two pounds a day for 90 days. As long as the cowpea vines were green and considerable seed was available very little cottonseed was eaten. The cost per pound of gain was only two cents for the cottonseed meal, thus showing the high value of the cowpea pasturage. The Oklahoma Experiment Station reports that cowpeas planted in July furnished two grazing periods for milk cows before frost and that the flow of milk was quite noticeably increased.

To use cowpeas strictly as pasture is not considered the best farm practice, but under certain conditions it is advisable and profitable. The best time to turn in the stock is when the crop has reached the stage of maturity best suited for hay—or when the first pods have matured. This practice is not generally followed, however, as it is customary to gather at least part of the seed. When pasturing is delayed for this reason results obtained are not so satisfactory, as the woody condition of stems makes them somewhat less palatable and not so greatly relished by livestock. When cowpeas are grown in corn, pasturing is generally deferred until the corn has been gathered.

Feeding Sows with Pigs

Many heavy losses among young pigs may be prevented by liberal and careful feeding of sows while they are nursing their litters. According to L. A. Weaver, of the Missouri College of Agriculture, the ration for sows should contain plenty of protein and mineral matter. Milk is high in these nutrients, and unless the sow is liberally supplied with them in her feed, maximum milk production cannot be expected. The ration at this time should be somewhat more bulky than that fed to very young pigs or fattening hogs, and the importance of good and ample pasture such as clover, alfalfa or rape cannot be overestimated. There are any number of combinations that have proved satisfactory for sows that are nursing pigs, of which the following is one of the best: Corn, 50 pounds; shorts, 25 pounds; wheat bran, 15 pounds; linseed oil meal, 10 pounds.

Avoiding Screw-Worm Attacks

The screw-worm is a native of America and has been causing great damage and serious trouble to stockmen for many years, particularly in the Southwest where screw-worm injury to range cattle is an annual occurrence. Cattlemen in this region accept the pest as a necessary evil, counting on doctoring a certain number of cases every year, but if a few simple steps were taken throughout the most severely infested districts, and certain control measures were consistently practiced, much could be done to eradicate the pest.

In attempting to control the pests, the importance of destroying carcasses of all sorts of animals cannot be overestimated. Careful estimates indicate that as many as a million flies of the variety causing screw-worm infestation of livestock may be produced from the dead body of a single cow. Under ideal conditions the life cycle, or the period required for the development of a mature fly from the newly hatched egg, ranges from one to four weeks, allowing for innumerable generations in a single season. Therefore it is of first importance that all dead bodies should be buried as soon as possible after death, though under range conditions this may be difficult. Nevertheless, the complete destruction of all dead animals by burning is by far the best method of control. This precaution not only stops the breeding of all blow flies but helps to prevent the dissemination of such diseases as anthrax, blackleg and hog cholera. When burning is not possible carcasses may be buried. To do this correctly, dig grave deeply enough to permit covering carcass with at least two feet of packed earth. Sprinkle inside of grave with lime, cover the carcass with a liberal layer, then cover with dirt.

Preventing Screw-Worm Infestation

Losses from screw-worm infestation at calving time can be to a large extent prevented if calves come early in the spring. In the Southwest this will mean between December 1st and the middle of April; further North the time of calving may safely be extended until June. As the eggs are laid by the screw-worm flies wherever an abrasion or injury of the skin occurs, it is well to avoid branding, castrating, dehorning and marking while flies are abundant, and to carry on these operations from December to May if possible. A small quantity of cottonseed oil containing four per cent. of carbolic acid applied to branding burns or other abrasion induces rapid healing and protects animals from screw-worm attacks.

Since dense brush and undergrowth are favorable to screw-worm breeding, every effort should be made to eradicate such breeding spots. Though clearing land of brush is more applicable to small pastures, some stock raisers have now cleared thousands of acres of all dense underbrush. This results in increased grass production, makes the finding of dead animals or wormy animals a more simple matter, facilitates the handling of stock on the range, and removes the "screw-worm nurseries" all from one operation.

As a large number of screw-worm attacks follow severe tick infestation, systematic dipping for ticks should be practiced, thus reducing the danger from screw-worms. Heavy infestation of ticks other than the common cattle tick often are followed by screw-worm attacks. This is particularly applicable to the Gulf Coast tick which attacks the inside of the ears of horses, mules and cattle. While the usual system of dipping will not completely destroy these ticks, it will reduce their numbers markedly. Furthermore, where cattle infested with screw-worm maggots are dipped in an arsenical solution, many of the maggots are killed.

As supplementary measures for reducing the number of screw-worm and other blow flies, fly traps and certain poison baits may be utilized. Full instructions regarding construction of traps and making and placing of baits will be found in Farmers' Bulletin 734 of the U. S. Department of Agriculture.

Foreign Plants Introduced

More than thirty countries are represented as sources of foreign plants and seeds recently introduced into the United States by the Department of Agriculture. The list contains descriptions of 285 new plants brought from all parts of the world by agricultural explorers, many of which may prove to be of great value to American farmers and stockmen. In view of the success of such former introductions as Rhodes grass and Sudan grass, four new forage grasses from New South Wales and a collection from the Belgian Congo should be of especial interest, and more will be published relative to these when certain experiments now under way have been completed. Tropical horticulturists may find something of interest and value in various fruits introduced from Guatemala, especially a large form of avocado known in that country as "coye." Although flavoring plants are not much used in most parts of this country, people in sections where it may be grown may be interested in a tropical vine that imparts the flavor of oysters to milk or potato soup.

Other plants in the new list are house plants that take on a graceful form; small hardy palms with showy edible fruits from Argentine; a tropical black walnut from Porto Rico that may have possibilities for timber production; a tree from Java with nodules imbedded in the leaves that collect and fix nitrogen from the air just as is done by root nodules in legumes; and a flouring cherry from Japan that may be grown in the Adirondack region.

Late Crops for Winter Feed

In regions where drought has damaged the hay crop there will be a shortage of roughage during the coming winter unless catch crops are immediately planted to offset the scarcity. Though it is growing late in the season, there are a few crops that may still be planted with fair assurance of getting a satisfactory yield.

Early soy-beans will make a good May crop if planted now, provided the ground is moist enough to germinate seed. It is unlikely that soy-beans will reach the full blossoming stage before heavy frost, but they will have made sufficient growth to fill the need for hay in both good quality and quantity. Millet or sudan grass may also be broadcasted on low land and harrowed in with no great outlay of labor, and the chance of a crop is good even this late in the season.

Do not forget the root crops. A few acres of rutabagas, mangels or common turnips will make a surprising yield, and will prove to be a "life-saver" for dairy or beef cattle next winter when a balanced ration will otherwise be impossible for lack of succulent feed. Roots are easily seeded and will grow later than any other farm crop without suffering severely from frost. They may be harvested almost at leisure during late fall after the more urgent fall work is completed, another factor which makes roots well worth considering.

Pumpkins do not receive the measure of credit they deserve as a feed for cattle and hogs. Of course it is now too late to plant them, but they are no doubt growing in innumerable corn fields where they withstand drought admirably. Do not consider them as an ornament. Give them storage room and a place in the roughage ration for winter feeding. They will help overcome the hay shortage, and cows and hogs will show their appreciation in increased production and weight.
